The Zen Sect of Buddhism

Foreword

Buddhism in the far east has been split within the last twenty centuries into many different sects. They can all find their lineage back to the Indian founder. The people were introduced by Indian missionaries but it can be said that the present state of development is largely contributed by the elaboration of the Chinese and Japanese geniuses.

With all the sects that have developed in Buddhism there is a unique sect that claims to be able to transmit the essence and spirit of Buddhism directly from its author. It also claims that this transmission is done without the use of the written word. Its is the sect of Buddha-Heart, more popularly known as the Zen Sect. (Dhyana in Sanskrit,.jhanain Pali,Ch'anin Chinese)

The Zen sect is unique in Buddhism but also in the history of religion generally. It is said that Zen is as different to Buddhism as buddhism is to Christianity. Its doctrines are very mystical sometimes it is only those that have gone trough proper training that can gain any understanding to some of the antidotes. Zen is most concern with the individuals spiritual enlightenment. Spiritual enlightenment is attained by the practice of concentrated contemplation. The practice is called Dyana or channa'(in China) and zenna (in Japan).

History of the Zen Sect

India

Zen scholars believe that their origination took place when the Buddha showed a nosegay of some golden colored flowers to a congregation of followers on Mount Vulture. The incident is known as the Dialogue on of the Buddha and Mahapitaka Brahmaraja. The followers asked the Buddha if it would be possible for the Buddha to preach the Dharma. Without saying a word the Buddha displayed the flowers to the crowd. No one in the crowd comprehended the meaning of this action but one man. Mahakashyapa smiled and nodded at the Buddha saying that he indeed understood the mystery of what is real and unreal. The Buddha handed down his command to Mahakashyapa knowing that his followers will be in good hands.

Mahakashyapa handed down his authority to Ananda when Ananda asked Mahakashyapa what was it that he received from the Buddha besides the robe and the bowl. Mahakahyapa instructed Ananda to take the flag pole down from the front gate. When Ananda received this order he expiernced enlightenment. Mahakashyapa handed over his authority to his junior disciple.

The Zen sect acknowledges twenty-eight Indian patriarchs after Buddha who successfully transmitted the Mind-Seal to Bodhidharma. For future reference they are as follows: 1)Mahakashyapa; 2)Ananda; 3)Sanavasa; 4)Upagupta; 5)Dhrtaka; 6)Micchaka; 7)Vasumitra; 8)Buddhananda; 9)Buddhamitra; 10)Parsva; 11)Punyayasha; 12)Asvaghosha; 13)Kapimala; 14)Nagarjuna; 15)Kanadeva; 16)Rahurata; 17)Sanghananda; 18)Kayasata; 19)Kumarata; 20)Jnayata; 21)Vasubandhu; 22)Manura; 23)Haklena; 24)Simha; 25)Bhagasita; 26)Punyamitra; 27)Prajnatara; 28)Bodhidharma.

China

Bodhidharama was the twenty-eighth Patriarch in India as you saw in the list of patriarchs but he was also the patriarch of China. Bodhidharma (Dharma for short) became a monk after he had reached manhood. He became the leader after the death of Prajnatara and fought for some sixty years against Heterodox schools. After this he sailed away to China under the instruction he had received from Prajnatara. When he arrived the Emperor Wu invited him to Nanking. The Emperor Wu was a devote Buddhist and had spent much effort in promoting the faith in his country. He did all this however with personal considerations. He asked Dharma what he thought his reward would be for promoting the faith in the manner that he had done. Dharma replied " No merit." Emperor Wu then asked what Dharma felt was the primary principle of the "Holy Doctrine." Dharma reply was " Vast emptiness and nothing within." The emperor was unable to understand the meaning of his words. HE then asked "who is he, then, that now confronts me?" Dharma reply was "I do not know."

Dharma was convinced that the emperor was not ready to understand the faith, so he moved on. He moved on to the Sholin monastery in the state of Northern Wei. At the Sholin monastery he spent nine years sitting against a wall in deep meditation. He was known as "the wall gazing brahmin".

Shen Kuang Second Patriarch of China

The second Patriarch of China was known as Hui-k'o originally named Shen Kuang. Shen Kuang was a Confucian scholar who was not satisfied with his teachers teachings. He sought out Dharma but Dharma would not give him any attention. Shen-kuang was so determined however that he stood out in the snow in front of the Dharma for seven days and nights. He became so desperate for instruction that he cut off his arm with his sword and presented it to Dharma, Saying "I have been seeking peace of mind these many years to no avail, Pray your reverence that my soul be pacified."

Dharma finally answered "where is your soul? Bring it out before me, and i shall have it pacified." Shen Kuang said that this was his problem. He could not find his soul. When Shen kuang said that he could not find his soul Dharma exclaimed "I have pacified your soul!" This was Shen kuang mile stone for then he understood. All his struggles vanished. Dharma finally died in 528 A.D. at the age of 150 years old according to tradition.

Patriarchal Order In China

1)Bodhidharma; 2)Hui-k'o; 3)Seng-ts'an; 4)Tao-hsin; 5)Hung-jen; 6)Hui-neng.

After Hung-jen the school broke off into two parts. One school prospered in the south while the heterodox school died in the north. The sixth Patriarch continued to lead the orthodox followers. This orthodox school is not so popular today in China but is flourishing and developing even today in Japan.

Hui-neng bought the faith back into the lime light when it was about to hide from the populous. He began his missionaries soon after the death of Hung-jen. He sent out his disciples and formed many schools. Two of the schools Soto and Rinzai developed and prospered through the T-ang (618-905) and the Sung (9690-1278) dynasties. This was the golden age of Zen.

The Transmission from Hung-jen to Hui-neng

Hung-jen once announced to his disciples that his successor would be anyone that can prove a thorough comprehension of the religion. All the disciples knew that the head monk Shen-Hsiu should be the one that succeeded after Hung-jen. Shen-Hsiu then took upon himself to write a stanza on his view of the religion. He posted outside the meditation hall this:

This body is the Bodhi-tree;
The soul is like a mirror bright:
Take heed to keep it always clean,
And let no dust collect on it.

These lines greatly impressed everyone but the following morning another message was posted alongside it:

The Bodhi is not like the tree;
The mirror bright is nowhere shining:
As there is nothing from the first,
Where can the dust itself collect?

Hui-neng wrote the latter lines and to Hung-jen they did describe the religion's view. That night Hung-jen secretly gave the robe and the bowl to Hui-neng. It did not take long however before everyone in the monastery knew what had happened. A gathering of monks assembled to try to stop Hui-neng who at this point was trying to leave the monastery. The leader of this group was a monk named Ming. Ming caught up with Hui-neng. Hui-neng said to Ming "This robe and bowl represent out patriarchal faith, it is not to be taken by force, pick it up if you desire it so." Ming then reached down to get when he found out that it was as heavy as a mountain. In awe Ming trembled and said "I come here for faith not the robe, Oh my brother monk, pray to dispel my ignorance."

After Hui-neng died the sect divided into two schools. These schools were known as the Nangaku (Nan-yuen) and the seigen (Ching-yuan). Hui-neng did not hand down the patriarchial to one of his disciples because of what happened to him. Hui-neng was the last patriarch of the Zen sect. Hui-neng changes in the sect led to a more open system of thought. No more was there a question of being orthodox or heterodox. Both of the new schools were equally orthodox. From this time through the Tang dynasty until about the Sung dynasty Zen developed and was the main stream faith of those centuries in China. It was partiularly accepted amoung the educated. It lost a lot of the Indian garb and the faith flourished into a Chinese faith. It is interesting to learn however that the faith in China is dead.

Behind the technique, know that there is the spirit (ri):
It is dawning now;
Open the screen,
And lo, the moonlight is shining in!

Every moment is sacred. It is only the individuals orientation to reality that differs. For Husker Du to make a Zen work, it requires them to be "completely in the moment" at all levels of production. To demonstrate the Zen qualities of Husker Du's Zen Arcade, it is first necessary to discuss what Zen is, followed the "Zen content" of Zen Arcade's lyrics and finally how the format of Zen Arcade is Zen influenced.

There have been numerous books and article written about the Zen of something. There is Zen Management, Zen and Computer Programming, Zen and the Art of Archery, and the list goes on forever. To write a paper on Zen punk may seem both absurd and impossible. After all, doesn't the word Zen imply some sort of spiritual or aesthetic qualities? How can one think of punk as spiritual? The answer is simple, and it makes every book or article ever written on Zen and anything else, obsolete and inane.

The purpose of Zen Buddhism is to grasp reality, as it is, in the moment. Whether one is attacking an enemy with a sword, managing employees, going to the bathroom, or playing in a punk rock band, the mind (and body) is in that moment one hundred percent. To distinguish Zen from some sort of activity means that the individual is only in the moment when that activity is practiced. Living in the moment becomes a special thing that one does every so often, completely apart from daily life. This dualistic nature is the antithesis of Zen. "As long as you are concerned about what you do, that is dualistic. If you are not concerned about what you do, you will not say so. When you sit, you will sit. When you eat, you will eat. That is all."

Lyrically, Zen Arcade (and punk in general) takes a simple, direct experience of reality and transforms it directly into a song without any extra language or flowery speech. The song "Broken Home, Broken Heart" demonstrates this:

> I LOOK AT YOUR HOUSE, I WONDER WHAT GOES ON INSIDE, WHEN YOU HAVE TO CRY YOURSELF TO SLEEP AT NIGHT. YOUR PARENTS FIGHT, YOU DON'T KNOW WHO'S WRONG OR RIGHT, HAVE TO CRY YOURSELF TO SLEEP AT NIGHT.
> A BROKEN HOME, A BROKEN HEART, WHEN THE TWO OF THEM WILL HAVE TO PART.
> BROKEN HOME BROKEN HEART -- NOW YOU KNOW JUST HOW IT FEELS TO HAVE TO CRY YOURSELF TO SLEEP AT NIGHT.

This direct experience followed by direct action is what is desired in Zen and the Japanese arts based in Zen. According to Yagyu Tajima no Kami Munenori, an ancient master samurai, the first principle of his Zen approach to swordsmanship is:

> The mind unmoved is emptiness; when moved it works the mysterious. Emptiness is one-mind-ness, one-mind-ness is no-mind-ness, and it is no-mind-ness that achieves wonders.

It is this no-mind-ness that characterizes Zen Arcade's lyrics. Most artists would try to load an album with a Zen theme with lofty philosophical concepts and imagery, but Husker Du is above that. They have created an album closer to true Zen experience than would have been possible with a philosophical concept album.

The perspective of the lyrics is also very Buddhist. Zen Arcade, like most punk albums, is very pessimistic. Life is identified with pain and suffering, as well as alienation. This is equivalent to the first of the Buddhist Four Noble Truths. The Buddha taught: "...here are the Four Noble Truths. What are these four? They are suffering, the source of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the way that leads to the cessation of suffering." Although Husker Du does not provide the answers to suffering, they still honestly present reality as they see it.

The way Zen Arcade was recorded is extremely Zen. The title alone suggests a setting in which chance, excitement, and fun are experienced in a pure, raw, "in-the-moment" manner. According to D.T. Suzuki, "Zen upholds intuition against intellection, for intuition is the more direct way of reaching the Truth." That is exactly how Husker Du explain the recording of Zen Arcade. "Everything on the record is first-take, except for `Something I Learned Today' and `Newest Industry', which started too fast....The whole thing took about 85 hours, the last 40 hours straight for mixing."

This direct way of experience is a purity that the samurai, influenced by Zen, wished to achieve. "The fighter is to be always single-minded with one object in view; to fight, looking neither backward nor sidewise. To get straight forward in order to crush the enemy is all that is necessary for him." This is the kind of spirit demonstrated in such songs as "Pride" and "I'll Never Forget You". These songs are not just sung, they are lived. The anger and pain are acute, and knowing that these songs were "first-takes" makes them even more intense. It is the kind of emotion that can't be reproduced time after time. It is beyond pain and emotion, singing and playing instruments, it is a pure level of awareness that transcends action. The Chinese Zen Master, Fu Daishi (497-569) wrote of this pure level:

> I hold a spade in my hands, and yet I hold it not;
> I walk and yet I ride on the water buffalo.

Subject and object merge together as one. Eugen Herrigal writes of what his Japanese archery master told him when he had finally mastered the art:

> He who can shoot with the horn of the hare and the hair of the tortoise, and can hit the center without bow (horn) and arrow (hair), he alone is Master in the highest sense of the word -- Master of the artless art. Indeed, he is the artless art itself and thus Master and No-Master in one.

Whether or not Husker Du was really "in the moment" when they recorded these songs is known only by them. The same holds true about the intent of their lyrics. Whether they intended Zen Arcade project to be produced with a Zen influence is unimportant. There is only one reality, and only one way to truly experience it. Zen has no monopoly on pure experience. Husker Du demonstrates this pure reality on Zen Arcade, sometimes in spite of themselves, and maybe even intentionally.

INTRODUCTION

For centuries people have stood in awe of the Buddha and his attainments and have strived to express their feelings in stone and bronze and with brush and ink. Some have been moved by what the Buddha said, its logical consistency, its scope and its humanism. Others have been inspired by the personality of the Lord himself, his manner and conduct, and even his physical form. The joyful faith and appreciation that is evoked on recollecting the Buddha's personality and singing his praise gives such people the strength they need to walk the Path. For them the Dhamma comes alive through the life and example of the Buddha.

Such a person was the poet Matrceta. He was born in India in about the first century A.D., and was converted from Hinduism to Buddhism by the great philosopher Aryadeva. He wrote about a dozen works, some of such beauty that he came to be regarded as one of India's greatest poets.[1] I-tsing, the Chinese pilgrim who traveled through India in the seventh century A.D., says of Matrceta's poems:

> These charming compositions are equal in beauty to the heavenly flowers and the high principles which they contain rival in dignity the lofty peaks of a mountain. Consequently in India all who compose hymns imitate his style, considering him the father of literature. Even men like Bodhisattvas Asanga and Vasubandhu admire him greatly. Throughout India everyone who becomes a monk is taught Matrceta's two hymns as soon as they can recite the five and ten precepts.

I-tsing also recounts a beautiful legend that was told about the poet indicating his wide popularity:

> While the Buddha was living, he was once, while instructing his followers, wandering in a wood among the people. A nightingale in the wood, seeing the Buddha, ... began to utter its melodious > notes, as if to praise him. The Buddha, looking back at his disciples, said: "That bird transported with joy at the sight of me unconsciously utters its melodious notes. On account of this good deed, after my passing away this bird shall be born in human form, and named Matrceta, shall praise my virtues with true appreciation."

Other than these few scraps of information we know nothing of Matrceta and today his name is remembered only for its association with his greatest work, the //Satapancasatka//.

The name //Satapancasatka// literally means "Hymn in a Hundred and Fifty Verses," although there are actually a hundred and fifty-two, or in some versions, a hundred and fifty-three verses in the work. It lies very much within the //bhakti// or devotional genre of Indian literature but is refreshingly free from the florid style that so often characterizes such works. Shackleton-Bailey notes that the "style of the Hymn is simple and direct, free from swollen compounds and elaborate conceits." [2] Warder says that "the restraint of these verses is that of complete mastery of the medium, able to express rich meaning with a few carefully chosen words and without the support of outward display." He goes on to say that the verses "are handled with a kind of reticence suggestive of the poet's humility and detachment, both of which are probably sincere." [3] Certainly all who are familiar with the Hymn in its original Sanskrit acknowledge the great beauty of both its language and meaning. In ancient India numerous commentaries were written on the Hymn. It was popular with the followers of all schools of Buddhism and was translated into several different languages. Taranatha, the great Tibetan historian, says the Hymn had an important part to play in the spread of Buddhism outside India, and should it become as well known as it once was it may continue to create an interest in the Buddha and his teachings. [4]

Centuries before Matrceta, the householder Upali was so inspired by the Buddha's presence that he too composed a hymn of praise. When asked why he had done so he replied:

> "It is as if there were a great heap of different flowers which a clever garland maker or his apprentice might string into a variegated garland. Likewise the Lord has many splendid qualities. And who would not give praise to one worthy of praise?" [5]

There can be no doubt that Matrceta's hymn likewise is an expression of a deep devotion to the Buddha and an admiration of his qualities. But quite apart from the author's motive in writing it, the value and indeed the purpose of the Hymn to the Buddha is twofold. First it is meant to awaken our faith. Matrceta recognized as did the Lord himself that faith has the power to arouse a tremendous amount of positive zeal and energy. Long before we have directly experienced it, faith keeps our eyes fixed firmly on the goal. When we stumble and fall, faith picks us up; when doubt causes us to falter, it urges us on; and when we get side-tracked, it brings us back to the Path. Without faith in the Buddha and the efficacy of his Dharma we would never even bother to try to put the teachings into practice. As Nagarjuna says:

One associates with the Dharma out of faith, but one knows truly out of understanding; understanding is the chief of the two, but faith precedes. [6]

The Buddha's qualities are worthy of respect in themselves, but when they are described so fully and so beautifully in verses like those of Matrceta, our faith can only be strengthened and grow.

The other purpose of the Hymn is to urge us into action. Matrceta highlights the Buddha's gentleness, his non-retaliation, his patience and his other qualities, knowing that when we have a deep admiration for someone it is natural to try to emulate him. One feels that he used his poetic skills to the full in the hope that we would be inspired enough to make the Buddha our model and follow his example. When we read that the Buddha extended the hand of friendship to all without exception we feel we should try to do the same. On being reminded that the Buddha endured abuse and hardship without complaint we find the strength to be a little more forbearing. When brooding over our imperfections casts us down, nothing fills us with new determination and vigor more than calling to mind the Buddha's attainments. The receptive mind will transform admiration into action.

The Hymn may have another value as well: as an aid to meditation. In concentration meditation thoughts are silenced, in mindfulness meditation they are observed with detachment, but in recollection meditation thoughts are directed to a specific subject which is then carefully pondered upon. The Buddha says: "Monks, whatever a monk ponders on and thinks about often the mind in consequence gets a leaning in that way," and this is certainly true. [7] Any type of thought that is prominent in our mind will have an influence upon our personality and behavior. To consciously and intentionally think positive thoughts will, in time, allow such thoughts to arise quite naturally, and from that will spring deeds associated with such positive thoughts. In practicing the Recollection of the Buddha, //Buddhanussati//, one sits silently, and having made the mind receptive, thinks about the Buddha's many deeds and qualities. In time, faith and devotion, both of which are important spiritual faculties, begin to gain in strength, thus adding energy and even fervor to our practice. Those who do this meditation usually either read or recite the well-known //Iti'pi so// formula to help guide their thoughts. But they may find that reading extracts from the Hymn to the Buddha can be used together with this formula, or at times as a substitute for it, with very positive results.

D.R. Shackleton-Bailey has done a complete English translation of the Hymn to the Buddha and Edward Conze has translated parts of it. [8] Both these translations are literal and scholarly but do not give sufficient regard to the spirit of the work and the author's intention in writing it -- to inspire and to uplift. By reworking these two translations and occasionally referring to the Sanskrit text with the help of my friend, Ven. Hippola Pannakithi, I have attempted to produce a readable rendering of this beautiful and important work. Those interested in a scholarly version of the Hymn are advised to read Shackleton-Bailey's translation with its copious notes on language, manuscript variations and textual difficulties.

HYMN TO THE BUDDHA

1. Invocation

1 No faults in any way are found in him;
All virtues in every way dwell in him.

2 To go to him for refuge, to sing his praise, to do him honor and to abide in his Dharma is proper for one with understanding.

3 The only Protector, his faults are gone without residue.
The All-knowing One,
his virtues are present without fail.

4 Even the most spiteful man cannot with justice find fault in the thoughts, words or deeds of the Lord.

5 To be born human and encounter the great joy of the good Dharma is a chance rarer than a turtle thrusting its neck through a yoke floating freely in the great ocean.

6 So how could I not put voice to good use now, for it is impermanent and may soon be liable to change.

7 Though I know that the Sage's virtues are beyond all human calculation, still I will recount a portion of them,
if only for my own delight.

8 Homage to you, O Self-developed One whose good works are many and wondrous, whose virtues are too numerous and awesome to define.

9 Their number? They are infinite.
Their nature? Words must fail.
But to speak of them bestows great good, so I shall speak much.

2. In Praise of Causes

10 Having brushed aside doubts about whether or not it could be done, of your own free will you took this helpless world under your protection.

11 You were kind without being asked,
you were loving without reason,
you were a friend to the stranger and a kinsman to those without kin.

12 You gave even your own flesh not to mention your wealth and possessions.
Even your own life's breath, O Kindly One, you gave to those who wished for it. [9]

13 A hundred times you ransomed your own body and life for the bodies and lives of living beings in the grip of their would-be slayers.

14 It was not fear of hell or desire for heaven but utter purity of heart that made you practice the good.

15 By always avoiding the crooked and adhering to the straight, you became the highest receptacle for purity.

16 When attacked you used your fiery power against the defilements, but in your noble heart felt only sympathy for those who were defiled.

17 The joy beings feel on saving their lives equals not the joy you experienced when you gave your life for others.

18 No matter how often murderers cut you to pieces, regardless of the pain
you felt only compassion for them.

19 That seed of perfect enlightenment, that jewel-like mind of yours,
only you, Great Hero, know its essence.
Others are far from understanding it.

20 "Nirvana is not won without perseverance":
thinking thus you roused great energy without a thought for yourself.

21 Your progress towards excellence never faltered and now you have attained the state that cannot be bettered.

22 But you did not practice in order to experience the pleasant and fruitful results of meditation.
Always in your heart the motive was compassion.

23 For the happiness which, though sublime, cannot be shared with others, pains rather than pleases those like you, O Righteous One.

24 You imbibed good speech,bad speech you shunned like poison, from mixed speech you extracted what was sweet. [10]

25 Purchasing words of wisdom even with your own life, in birth after birth, O Knower of Gems, you were zealous for enlightenment.

26 Thus striving through the three incalculable aeons accompanied only by your resolution, you gained the highest state. [11]

3. In Praise of Incomparability

27 By not envying the superior, despising the inferior,
or competing with equals, you attained pre-eminence in the world.

28 You were devoted to virtues for their own sake, not for the rewards that come from them, and thus due to your right progress
they have all come to completion within you.

29 So much good have you gathered by your deeds that even the dust on your feet has become a source of merit.

30 You dissolved and uprooted your faults, you purified and brought to completion your virtues, and by this wise procedure
you reached the highest attainment.

31 You struck at faults with your might so that not even their shadow lingers in the depths of your mind. [12]

32 Step by step you nurtured the virtues and established them in yourself, so that now not even their likeness is found elsewhere.

33 All worldly objects of comparison can be damaged or obstructed, limited by time and space, easily acquired.

34 How can they be compared with your virtues -- virtues unrivaled, unapproachable, stable, unceasing, unsurpassed?

35 When measured against the unfathomable and boundless depth of your understanding, the ocean becomes as if a mere puddle.

36 When matched with your calm equanimity, the firmness of the earth seems like the quivering of a flower petal.

37 Beside the radiance of your wisdom, which destroys the darkness of ignorance,
the sun does not attain even the brightness of a firefly.

38 The purity of the moon, the sky or a pool in autumn appears clouded when compared with the purity of your words, thoughts and deeds.

39 I have compared you with all that is admired in the world, but still how far are those miserable things from the qualities of a Buddha.

40 For there is only one thing that resembles you,
O Kindly One, and that is the jewel of the Dharma through which you attained the highest.

41 But if something were to be found comparable to you, to make such comparison would be the act of a foolish and disrespectful man.

* * *

4. In Praise of Wonders

42 Your victory over Mara evokes wonder in people but considering your great virtues
I think this is but a minor thing. [13]

43 Even those who lash out in fury to assault you are not a heavy burden for your patience to bear housed as it is in such a worthy vessel.

44 What is truly wondrous is this:
after you conquered Mara, on that same night you were able to conquer your own defilements.

45 He who is amazed at your victory over opponents, might well be amazed at the sun for dispelling the darkness with its garland of a thousand rays.

46 You have overcome three things with three things:
passion with passionlessness, anger with love,
and ignorance with wisdom.

47 Good deeds you praise, bad deeds you blame, but towards those who act thus you are free from any "for" or "against."

48 Is any praise high enough for you whose mind transcends

attachment to the noble and dislike for the ignoble? [14]

49 You did not cling to virtue nor yearn for those who were virtuous.
Ah! See the purity of this most tranquil being!

50 How permanently calm your mind is can be known by seeing how unalterably calm your senses are.

51 Even the foolish acknowledge the purity of your mind.
The goodness of your words and deeds reflects your pure thoughts.

5. In Praise of Form

52 Lovely yet calming, bright but not blinding, gentle yet strong. Who would not be inspired just to see you?

53 The joy one feels on beholding you for the first time does not diminish even after seeing you a hundred times.

54 Each time it is seen, your form gives joy;
its beauty is such that one is never satisfied.

55 Your body is worthy as a receptacle and your virtues are worthy as occupants.
Both are excellent in themselves and both complement each other perfectly.

56 Where else could the virtues of a Tathagata be so well housed as in your body, shining as it does with auspicious marks and signs? [15]

57 Your body seems to say to your virtues:
"I am blessed to have you," and your virtues seem to respond:
"Where better could we dwell?"

* * *

6. In Praise of Compassion

58 You long bound yourself to compassion in order to free all those in the world who were bound by defilements.

59 Which shall I praise first, you or the great compassion by which you were long held in samsara though well you knew its faults? [16]

60 Although you preferred the delights of solitude, compassion led you to spend your time among the crowd.

61 Like a mighty dragon drawn from its lake by a spell, compassion led you from forest to town for the sake of those to be taught.

62 Though abiding in deep tranquillity, the development of compassion made you take up even the musical art. [17]

63 Your powers, your lion's roar and the manifestation of virtues are but glitter rubbed off the nugget of your innate compassion. [18]

64 Your compassion was kind only towards others, but was cruel towards her own master.
Towards you alone, O Lord, compassion was pitiless. [19]

65 That same compassion had you cut into a hundred pieces and cast you like an offering to the four quarters, all for the sake of others.

66 But clearly compassion always acted in accordance with your will. For although she oppressed you, he did not transgress against your desires.

* * *

7. In Praise of Speech

67-8 Well worded and significant, true and sweet, deep or plain or both together, condensed or copious.
Hearing such words of yours, would not even an opponent be convinced that you were all-knowing?

69 Generally your speech was wholly sweet but when necessary it would be otherwise.
But either way, every word was well spoken because it always achieved its purpose.

70 Soft or hard or possessing both qualities, all your words when distilled had but one taste. [20]

71 Ah! How pure, perfect and excellent your actions are, that you employed these jewel-like words in such a way.

72 From your mouth pleasing to the eye, drop words pleasing to the ear, like nectar from the moon. [21]

73 Your sayings are like a spring shower settling the dust of passions, like a garuda killing the serpent of hatred. [22]

74 They are like the sun again and again dispelling the darkness of ignorance, like Sakra's scepter splitting the mountain of pride. [23]

75 Your speech is excellent in three ways:
based on fact it is truthful, because its motive is pure it causes no confusion, and being relevant it is easily understood.

76 When first heard your words excite the mind but when their meaning is pondered over they wash away all ignorance and passion.

77 They go to the hearts of all.
While comforting the grieving they alarm the heedless and rouse those preoccupied with pleasures.

78 Truly your words are for all: they delight the wise, strengthen those of middling intelligence and illuminate the minds of the dull.

79 Your sayings coax men from false views and draw them towards Nirvana.
They remove faults and rain down virtues.

80 Your knowledge embraces all things, your mindfulness is ever present and thus what you say will always come to pass.

81 Because you never speak at the wrong time or in the wrong place or towards the wrong person, your words, like energy rightly applied, are never wasted.

8. In Praise of Teaching

82 Your dispensation and only yours is the true path:
its methods are pleasant, its fruits good,
it is free from faults and lovely in the beginning, the middle and the end. [24]

83 If fools, because of their attachment to deluded views, condemn your wonderful teaching,
then deluded views are their own worst enemy.

84 Remembering the suffering which you endured for the sake of others, it would be good to listen to your teachings even if they were wrong.

85 But coming from one so kind in words and deeds, how much more should your teachings be practiced with all the vigor one would use to remove a blazing turban from one's head .

86 Freedom, the joy of enlightenment, praiseworthy virtues and peace:
these four benefits are all gained from your teaching.

87 O Great Hero, your teachings brought trembling to sectarians, misery to Namuci, but rejoicing to both gods and men. [25]

88 Even the rule of Death, which extends without impediment or obstacle over the triple world, has been crushed by your teaching. [26]

89 For those who fathom your teachings can live an aeon if they so desire, but freely they depart to the realm where death cannot tread. [27]

90 Only in your dispensation is time divided for studying the scriptures, pondering their meaning and practicing meditation.

91 What is more distressful than this, Great Sage, that some people do not revere your teaching, full of goodness as it is?

* * *

9. In Praise of Benefits Conferred

92 Just to hear you brings joy;
just to look upon you calms the heart;
Your speech refreshes and your teaching frees.

93 People rejoice at your birth, they celebrate as you grow, they benefit from your presence and sorrow in your absence.

94 To praise you removes faults, to recollect you brings joy,
to follow you gives understanding,
to know you purifies the heart.

95 To approach you brings good fortune, to serve you gives wisdom,
to worship you dispels fear,
to wait upon you bestows prosperity.

96 You are a great lake of goodness, with waters purified by virtue, surface calmed by meditation and depths stilled by wisdom.

97 Your form is a jewel to see, your speech is a jewel to hear,
your teachings are a jewel to reflect upon.
Truly, you are a mine bearing the jewels of goodness.

98 You are an island for those swept along by the flood,
a shelter for the stricken,

a refuge for those in fear of becoming, a resort for those who aspire to liberation.

99 To all living beings
you are a useful vessel because of your virtue, a fertile field because of your perfect fruit,
a true friend because of the benefits you confer.

100 You are admired for your altruism, charming for your tenderness, beloved for your gentleness and honored for your many virtues.

101 You are cherished because of your flawlessness, delightful because of the goodness of your form and speech, opulent because you promote the good of all,
and blessed because you are the abode of virtues.

10. In Praise of Guidance

102-3 You admonish the stubborn, restrain the hasty and straighten the crooked.
You encourage the slow and harness the tamed.
Truly, you are the unsurpassed guide of men.

104 You have pity for the suffering, good-will for the happy, compassion for the distressed, benevolence for all.

105 The hostile evoke your warmth, the immoral receive your help, the fierce find you tender.
How wonderful is your noble heart!

106 If father and mother are to be honored because of concern for their children, what reverence should you receive who love has no limits?

107 You are a wall of safety for those hovering at the edge of the cliff, those blind to their own welfare,
those who are their own worst enemy.

108 For the welfare of the two worlds and to help beings transcend them, you lit the lamp of wisdom
among those who dwell in darkness. [28]

109 When worldly enjoyments are at stake, men and gods act at variance with each other.
But because they can enjoy the Dharma in harmony, they are reconciled in you.

110 O Blessed One, you have given the comfort of the Dharma unstintingly to all, regardless of birth, age or caste, regardless of time or place.

111 As if amazed and envious the gods honor with joined palms even your disciples, who unlike them are free from amazement and envy.

112 Ah! How brilliant is the arising of a Buddha, that cream of samsara.
Because of him the gods envy mankind.

* * *

11. In Praise of Arduous Deeds

113 Fatigue, loss of the joy of solitude, the company of fools, the press of the crowd and the pairs of opposites: all these discomforts you endure as if they were blessings. [29]

114 With mind detached, you quietly work for the welfare of the world.
How awesome is the Buddha-nature of the Buddha! [30]

115 You ate poor food, sometimes you went hungry.
You walked rough paths and slept on the ground trampled hard by the hooves of cattle. [31]

116 Though you are the Master, in order to serve others you endured insults and adapted your clothes and words, out of love for those whom you taught.

117 You are the Lord, but you never lord it over others.
All may use you as a servant to obtain the help they need.

118 No matter who provoked you, where or how, never did you transgress your own path of fair conduct.

119 You help those who wish you ill more than most men help those who wish them well.

120 To an enemy intent on evil you are a friend intent on good.
To one who gleefully seeks faults you respond by seeking virtues.

121 Those who sought to give you poison and fire you approached with compassion and nectar.

122 You conquered revilers with patience, the malicious with blessings,

slanderers with truth and the cruel with kindness.

123 You reversed in an instant the manifold natures and evil destinies of those depraved from beginningless time.

* * *

12. In Praise of Skill

124 Through your skill in teaching the rough became gentle, the mean became generous and the cruel became kind.

125 A Nanda became serene, a Manastabdha humble, an Angulimala compassionate.
Who would not be amazed? [32]

126 Delighted with the flavor of your teaching, many wise ones left their beds of gold to sleep on beds of straw.

127 Because you knew time and temperaments, sometimes you remained silent when questioned, sometimes you spoke first, and at other times you aroused their interest and then spoke.

128 Having first scrubbed clean the garment of the mind with talk on generosity and other virtues, you then applied the dye of the Dharma.

129 There is no expedient or opportunity which you did not use in order to rescue this pitiful world from the fearful abyss of samsara.

130 To train people in different situations, according to their state of mind,

many and various were the words and deeds you used.

131 They were pure and friendly, honored and praised, saluted and acclaimed by both gods and men.

132 Difficult it is to speak well and then do good.
But for you, O Truthful One, both these things come easily.

133 By your purity alone you could have cleansed the whole universe.
In the triple world no one is to be found like you.

134 You rose up for the welfare of all beings lost in the beginningless and fearful straits of becoming.

* * *

13. In Praise of Freedom from Debt

135 I know not how to repay you for what you have done; even those who have attained Nirvana are still in your debt.

136 Established in the Dharma by you, they accomplished their own welfare only.
But you worked by yourself for the welfare of all,
so how can you be repaid for that?

137 You look upon those who slumber and gently awaken them.
You are a kind and heedful friend to those who are heedless.

138 You have declared the destruction of the defilements, you have exposed Mara's delusions, you have taught the evils of samsara,
you have revealed the place without fear.

139 Those who work for the welfare of the world and those of compassionate heart, what could they do wherein you have not already led the way?

140 If your good qualities could be given to others, surely you would have shared them with all,
even with Devadatta. [33]

141 Out of compassion for the world you promoted the good Dharma for so long on earth.
Many disciples have you raised capable of working for the welfare of the world. [34]

142 Many personal converts have you trained, Subhadra being the last.
What still remains of your debt to living beings? [35]

143 Powdering your bones into tiny pieces with the diamond of concentration, even in the end you continued to do what was hard to do.

144 "My Dharma body and my physical body both exist only for the sake of others." Speaking thus even in Nirvana you taught this reluctant world. [36]

145 Having given your entire Dharma body to the virtuous, you broke your physical body into fragments and attained final Nirvana.

146 What steadfastness! What conduct!
What form! What virtue!
Truly there is nothing about the Buddha's qualities that is not wonderful.

147 Yet even to you whose speech and actions are so helpful are some men hostile. Behold the ferocity of delusion!

148 O ocean of good, treasury of gems, heap of merit, mine of virtues!
Those who honor you are themselves worthy of honor.

149 Your virtues are limitless but my capacity to praise them is not.
Therefore I shall finish, not because I am satisfied but for fear of running out of words.

150 Only you can measure your own qualities being as they are beyond measure, beyond number, thought and comparison.

151 I have hardly begun to sing your praise and yet already my heart is filled with joy.
But need a lake be drained before one's thirst be quenched?

152 Through the merit arising from my good deed, born of faith in the Sage,
may the minds of beings now tossed by evil thoughts be free from distress and come to peace.

9 Here and in verses 13, 17 and 18 reference is to the Buddha sacrificing his life in former births as recounted in the Jataka Stories.

10 A mixture of truth and falsehood, useful and useless.

11 It is said to take a bodhisattva at least three incalculable aeons to attain full enlightenment. See Har Dayal, //The Bodhisattva Doctrine in Buddhist Sanskrit Literature// (London, 1932).

12 //Atmasamtane//: literally, "the flow (of consciousness) that makes up the self." Pali, //cittasantati//.

13 //Mara//: evil personified, the Tempter in Buddhism.

14 //Arhat//: literally, a saint. //Tirthika//: an adherent of a non-Buddhist sect

15 //Tathagata//: An epithet of the Buddha meaning the "Thus Come One" or the "Thus Gone One." The thirty-two major marks and the eighty minor signs are special features of a Buddha's physical body.

16 //Samsara//: the beginningless round of birth and death.

17 In one of his former lives the Buddha was born as a musician and used his skills to convert the gods. See Guttila Jataka.

18 On the ten psychic powers, see Nyanatiloka, //Buddhist Dictionary// (Colombo, 1972) under //Iddhi//. The "lion's roar" is the Buddha's bold and confident claim to enlightenment. The meaning of this verse is that compassion, the nugget is the most important thing while the powers, etc., "the glitter," are just a by-product of that compassion.

19 Here and in verses 65 and 66 compassion is personified as one who acts for the sake of others even to the extent of causing discomfort to the Buddha.

20 The taste of liberation (//vimuttirasa//) -- Udana 56.

21 The ancient Indians believed that nectar fell from the moon.

22 The //garuda// is a mythological bird, the natural enemy of the serpent.

23 //Sakra// is the king of the gods in Vedic mythology. He has a scepter of unbreakable hardness.

24 //Ekayanam//: literally, the one way, thus "the true path."

25 //Namuci//: another name for Mara.

26 The triple world: the world of desire, the world of form and the formless world. See //Buddhist Dictionary// under //Loka//.

27 For the notion that those who have mastered the teaching can live for an aeon, see Digha Nikaya, II: 103,118.

28 The "two worlds" are the world of gods and the world of humans.

29 The pairs of opposites are praise and blame, cold and heat, sickness and health, ease and discomfort, etc.

30 //Buddhadharmata//. See //Encyclopedia of Buddhism//, Vol. III (Colombo, 1973), p.435.

31 For a description of the hardships and simplicity of the Buddha's life similar to those mentioned here, see Anguttara Nikaya, 1:34.

32 Nanda was so distracted by sensual thoughts that he was unable to meditate -- Udana 21. Manastabdha was so proud that he would not even respect his parents -- Samyutta Nikaya, I:177. Angulimala was a terrible murderer -- Majjhima Nikaya, II: 98-103. All were skillfully transformed by the Buddha.

33 Devadatta was the Buddha's evil cousin who caused a schism in the monastic community and even tried to kill the Buddha.

34 Shackleton-Bailey includes, prior to this verse, a verse of which he notes that its grammatical peculiarities and exclusion from early texts are "sufficiently strong grounds for doubting its authenticity." I have therefore decided to omit it.

35 As he lay on his death-bed the Buddha taught and made a disciple of Subhadra. See Digha Nikaya, II:149, 153.

36 Here and in verse 145 the Buddha's teaching or Dharma body, which lasts as long as people understand and practice his teachings, is compared with his physical body which disintegrates at death. See I.B. Horner's discussion on //dhammakaya// in //Milinda's Questions// (London, 1963), p:xl

"I know all about it. We had a tough time with Jill at that age," Dana said, speaking of her 19

Jill was out of the house and she and Drew were still young.

Drew was in his twenties when they met and married and he had wanted children right away first but she was young and eventually gave in to his pressure. It had all worked out for them were financially well off now and life was good.

Mary Ellen sighed and gazed out the window at the children playing in the back yard. At leas happy and well adjusted, she thought.

Rockmont was a great upper-middle class community with good public schools and plenty o to play. It had been a strain when they had bought the house eight years ago but it had been struggle. Richard was making great money now with his PC support business and they had country club. She knew that she should have been very happy but, unfortunately, there was home for Richard's success. He was rarely home since he started the business. He had pro that the long hours and hard work was only temporary, until he got the business going. How years ago and he still worked eighty hours a week.

While Richard's work was a big part of Mary Ellen's problem it was not the entire issue. Som he worked just so he didn't have to be around her. It seemed they rarely even touched anym the issues in the bedroom. It had been a long time since they had been intimate. For a while maybe Richard was having an affair and even considered hiring a private detective. Howeve that there was a major gap between their desires for sex. Unfortunately, the gap was about get now. Besides that, Richard had always been hung up about sex and refused anything bu position. She had tried to talk to him about it but he refused to even discuss the subject.

On the other hand, it appeared to Mary Ellen that Dana had the perfect life. Drew seemed to the time. The fact that he worked out of the house had something to do with it, however it wa She could see how loving the two of them acted around each other. They were like newlywe and whispering little secrets to one another. They just seemed compatible. Besides that, Dre handsome and sexy. He was in his forties but looked younger, even with his slightly graying temples. He was tall and well built as well-the rugged outdoors type. He owned some kind o and appeared to make it work by the sheer power of his personality. Mary Ellen was envious so handsome, but because he was so attentive to Dana.

Dana knew that something was bothering Mary Ellen. They had been friends too long. She k to do with Mary Ellen and Richard's relationship because there had been several strong hint want to pry, she was her best friend. "What's the matter?" Dana finally asked.

"Oh nothing." Mary Ellen sighed and looked into her coffee cup.

"Sure something's the matter," Dana responded. "I've known you too long not to see it. We h able to share our problems. Come on."

Mary Ellen took a deep breath. She was dying to tell Dana but didn't want to burden her with problems. It was now or never she thought. "It's... it's just that... oh I don't know, something's that she was dramatically understating the issue.

"Have you tried sexy underwear?" Dana laughed.

"I'm serious," Mary Ellen said and a little tear came to her eye.

Dana saw her eyes start to tear up and realized that she was indeed serious. "I'm sorry Mary

"It's more than that," Mary Ellen said and paused.

Mary Ellen blushed again as well. "Well, thanks for making me feel better."

After a long and somewhat uncomfortable pause, Dana took a deep breath and said, "I still t consider the underwear angle. I hate to tell you this lady, but you need to spice up your ward

"What's wrong with my wardrobe?" Mary Ellen said defensively.

Dana looked at Mary Ellen and bit her lip, trying to decide if she should go any further. This subject, especially because she was already obviously feeling depressed. Dana didn't want worse but she thought that if your own friends won't tell you the truth then who will. Finally sl said, "It has been getting a little shabby lately. I think some new things would do wonders fo life."

At first Mary Ellen looked shocked and hurt, but then her face showed resignation. "I guess y have been neglecting myself lately and I'm probably in just as much of a rut as Richard. The willing to try anything." She fell silent for a minute and then said, "Maybe you could go shopp sometime and help me pick out some sexy clothes?"

"I'd love to."

The back door suddenly opened and Drew came in. "Hi sweetie," he said as he walked over her on the lips. Then he leaned over and kissed Mary Ellen on the cheek. "How's my second said and wrapped his arm around her shoulder.

How to Eat Pussy Like a Champ (Oh yes, you're going to be very popular)

What is more the essence of sex than a woman's vagina? The source of her pleasure, home center of her sexual universe? Nothing, in my opinion.

All roads lead to the vagina, do they not? Look at a lovely woman. On the street, in the mall, anywhere. Her abundant hair, alluring eyes, soft full lips. Follow down the curve of her neck, her breasts, the strength of her stomach. When you hit the center of her body, right between legs, you've hit the center of her being.

Or start with her delicate feet. Strong enough to carry her for a lifetime, yet supple enough to

And here's a great one: she's sitting in a chair while you kneel in front of he lapping her juices. She can keep her legs spread with her feet on the floor, or place them ov shoulders. If she's just about th keep doing what you're doing until she cums. Variety is great, but when you're about to scor don't change the play. Gee, you think they discuss this in locker room pep talks?

Her clit, which you know by now is like a mini penis, is the center of her universe. So make s get the best access you can to it. How? By pulling the clitoral hood out of the way. To some clitoral hood, which protects her clit like an umbrella protects you from the rain, will move ou on its own. But not all the way. Therefore, take your thumb and from the top of the hood, pul lovely little clit is fully exposed. Do it in the light at first, so you can see what its like when yo a dark bedroom, closet, prison cell, basement…you know, the usual places.

Above all, do go for it! If you remember just one thing, it's to lick, fondle and suck your way t There's no downside to giving her oral sex. No taboo, no mystery. If you want to be conside it's got to be in your repertoire. You'll love it, believe me, just love it.

We are going to discuss the life and teachings of Naropa fully and completely, but not fully and completely in the way you would like. We are going to discuss the outlines of Naropa's life and his relationship with his guru Tilopa, and the twelve acts of repentance he had to go through. We will also discuss his Mahamudra experience. Mahamudra means "great symbol"; it is connected with seeing the phenomena of the world as they are. We will close our discussion with the six teachings of Naropa.

I find it necessary to express my negativities about presenting such potent - two hundred percent potent - teachings to the people of the continent of North America, or to the West altogether. Nobody here seems to be ready for this material at all. People are relating with the starting point of practice, and as far as we know, nobody in America has a complete understanding of even the hinayana level of Buddhism. People have hardly any understanding at all. They have a completely schizophrenic attitude: they conceive of a divine, enlightened personality that is opposed to their confused version of themselves. As a result, people regard themselves as abandoned people, completely bad people. Or else they might have some hope, but that again is based on some kind of spiritual pride that does not leave any leeway for confusion at all. So we're hopeless. I'm afraid we're hopeless.

Isn't that a terrible, grim picture? Extremely grim. We are hopeless, absolutely confused. We are so confused we do not even know why we are here listening to this. We wonder why. We are extremely confused, bewildered. What can we do about that? Let alone talking about Naropa?

Naropa achieved something. He found his way in the end. Once he became a disciple of Tilopa, he was okay. But before he became a disciple of Tilopa, he was confused, as much as we are.

Spiritual practice is stepping out of the duality of me-ness and my-ness as opposed to otherness, of who is me and who is not me. But in addition to this we have the further confusion of gurus laying their trips on us. Or, as they are called in America, guh-ROOS. That particular species of human beings we call guh-ROOS are mysterious. They save you. They tell you they save you entirely, but on the other hand they tell you they still have to work on themselves. We are confused. They are broke. It's a hopeless situation.

If we want to write essays about that for our Ph.D., we won't be able to, because we are so confused. Even if we want to become professional gurus, we won't be able to make head or tail of it. Of course a lot of people decide to "make a journey to the East," to live with the natives: study with them, eat with them, and shit with them, whether they use toilet tissue or not. They are serious, obviously, and faithful in playing Burmese games, Japanese games, and so on. They get right into it - sit with the Orientals, eat with them, shit with them. We are getting back a lot of anthropological messages about these "primitive" societies. It seems that though they are primitive, their spiritual understanding is much higher than ours. In any case, these are the trips we have going on.

I would like to call your attention to the following passage from the Life of Naropa:

Once when 'Jig-med grags-pa (Abhayakirti) [Naropa], with his back to the sun, was studying the books on grammar, epistemology, spiritual precepts, and logic, a terrifying shadow fell on them. Looking round he saw behind him an old woman with thirty seven ugly features: her eyes were red and deep-hollowed; her hair was fox-coloured and dishevelled; her forehead large and protruding; her face had many wrinkles and was shrivelled up; her ears were long and lumpy; her nose was twisted and inflamed; she had a yellow beard streaked with white; her mouth was distorted and gaping; her teeth were turned in and decayed; her tongue made chewing movements and moistened her lips; she made sucking noises and licked her lips; she whistled when she yawned; she was weeping and tears ran down her cheeks; she was shivering and panting for breath; her complexion was darkish blue; her skin was rough and thick; her body bent and askew; her neck curved; she was hump-backed; and, being lame, she supported herself on a stick. She said to Naropa: "What are you looking into?"

"I study the books on grammar, epistemology, spiritual precepts, and logic," he replied.

"Do you understand them?"

"Yes."

"Do you understand the words or the sense?"

"The words."

The old woman was delighted, rocked with laughter, and began to dance, waving her stick in the air. Thinking that she might feel still happier, Naropa added: "I also understand the sense." But then the woman began to weep and tremble and she threw her stick down.

"How is it that you were happy when I said that I understood the words, but became miserable when I added that I also understood the sense?"

"I felt happy because you, a great scholar, did not lie and frankly admitted that you only understood the words. But I felt sad when you told a lie by stating that you understood the sense, which you do not."

"Who, then, understands the sense?"

"My brother."

"Introduce me to him, wherever he may be."

"Go yourself, pay your respects to him, and beg him that you may come to grasp the sense."

With these words, the old woman disappeared like a rainbow in the sky. [The Life and Teaching of Naropa, trans. Herbert V. Guenther (Boston & London:Shambala Publications, 1986), pp. 24-25]

Naropa was studying epistemology, logic, philosophy, and grammar. That's where we are at. Of course everybody is also extremely involved with art now. Everybody is trying to work out their artistic self-expression. They might hear the teachings of Naropa in connection with art; they might see it in terms of "the art of the Tibetan teachings." Then there is also logic, the question of how the teachings relate with each other, how not and how so. We are involved with logic as well. It could be said that everybody here is in the first stage of Naropa's experience, involved in philosophy and art, as well as epistemology. We are on the same level Naropa was experiencing before enlightenment. We want an answer; we want definitions. We want a fixed situation rather than something fluid. We feel that concepts are very badly needed.

In this seminar you are not going to be able to relate with concepts. You're not going to get something out of studying logic, epistemology, grammar, and philosophy - which were a failure for Naropa as well. That is why he had to go through twelve stages of punishment, because of his concepts. We are going to go through the same journey that Naropa went through; we are going to take a tour of Naropa's agony. In some ways, it is going to be like Disneyland. You go through some tunnel, and you come out; you're delivered to somewhere else. You see exciting things and you come out on the other end. But in this case, it is related with psychological problems. It is going to be more deathening, more hellish or more heavenish. We start at Naropa's starting point of searching for goodness and trying to achieve divinity.

II: Genuine Madness and Pop Art

And he proceeded onwards in an Eastern direction.

These were the visions he had:

When he had come to a narrow footpath that wound between rocks and a river, he found a leper woman without hands and feet blocking his path.

"Do not block the way, step aside."

"I cannot move. Go around if you are not in a hurry, but if you are, jump over me."

Although he was full of compassion, he closed his nose in disgust and leaped over her. The leper woman rose in the air in a rainbow and said:

Listen Abhayakirti:
The Ultimate in which all become the same Is free of habit-forming thought and limitations.
How, if still fettered by them,
Can you hope to find the Guru?

At this the woman, the rocks, and the path all vanished and Naropa fell into a swoon on a sandy plateau. When he recovered consciousness he thought: "I did not recognize this to be the Guru, now I shall ask anyone I meet for instruction." Then he got up and went on his way praying.

On a narrow road he met a stinking bitch crawling with vermin. He closed his nose and jumped over the animal, which then appeared in the sky in a rainbow halo and said:

All living beings by nature are one's parents.
How will you find the Guru, if Without developing compassion
On the Mahayana path
You seek in the wrong direction?
How will you find the guru to accept you
When you look down on others?

After these words the bitch and the rocks disappeared and Naropa again swooned on a sandy plateau.

When he came to, he resumed his prayers and his journey, and met a man carrying a load.

"Have you seen the venerable Tilopa?"

"I have not seen him. However, you will find behind this mountain a man playing tricks on his parents. Ask him."

When he had crossed the mountain, he found the man, who said:

"I have seen him, but before I tell you, help me to turn my parents' head."

But Abhayakirti thought: "Even if I should not find the venerable Tilopa, I cannot associate with a scoundrel, because I am a prince, a Bhikshu, and a scholar. If I seek the Guru I will do so in a respectable way according to the dharma."

Everything happened as before, the man receded into the centre of a rainbow halo and said:

How will you find the Guru, if
In this doctrine of Great Compassion
You do not crack the skull of egotism With the mallet of non-Pure-Egoness and nothingness?

The man disappeared like a rainbow and Naropa fell senseless to the ground. When he woke up there was nothing and he walked on praying as he went.

Beyond another mountain he found a man who was tearing the intestines out of a human corpse and cutting them up. Asked whether he had seen Tilopa, he answered:

"Yes, but before I show him to you, help me to cut up the intestines of this decayed corpse."

Since Naropa did not do so, the man moved away into the centre of a rainbow -coloured light and said:

How will you find the Guru, if
You cut not Samsara's ties
With the unoriginatedness of the Ultimate
In its realm on non-reference?

And the man disappeared like a rainbow.

When Naropa had recovered from his swoon and gone on his way praying, he found on the bank of a river a rascal who had opened the stomach of a live man and was washing it with warm water. When he asked him whether he had seen the venerable Tilopa, he replied:

"Yes, but before I show him, help me."

Again Naropa refused, and the man appearing in a centre of light in the sky said:

How will you find the Guru, if
With the water of profound instruction
You cleanse not Samsara, which by nature [is] free
Yet represents the dirt of habit-forming thoughts?

And the man disappeared in the sky.

After having woken from his swoon Naropa prayed and journeyed on until he came to the city of a great king, whom he asked whether he had seen Tilopa. The king replied:

"I have seen him, but marry my daughter before I show him to you."

Having taken her, he seemed to spend a long time. Then the king, not wishing to let him go, took back the girl and the dowry and left the room. Not recognizing this as a magic spell, but thinking that he would have to employ force with the aid the bDe-mchog rtsa-rgyud, Abhhidhana-uttaratantra, he heard a voice say:

Are you not deceived by a magic show?
How then will you find the Guru
If through desire and dislike you fall
Into the three forms of evil life?

And the whole kingdom disappeared.

When Naropa came to, he travelled in prayer until he met a dark man with a pack of hounds, a bow and arrows.

"Have you seen Tilopa?"

"Yes."

"Show him to me."

"Take this bow and arrow and kill that deer."

When Naropa refused, the man said:

A hunter, I have drawn the arrow

Of the phantom body which from desires is free
In the bow, of radiant light the essence:
I shall kill the fleeting deer of this and that,
On the mountain of the body believing in an I.
Tomorrow I go fishing in the lake.

So saying, he disappeared.

When Naropa had recovered he continued prayerfully in search of the Guru and came to the shore of a lake full of fish. Nearby two old people were ploughing a field, killing and eating the insects they found in the furrows.

"Have you seen Tilopa?"

"He stayed with us, but before I show him to you - hallo, wife, come and get this Bhikshu something to eat."

The old woman took some fish and frogs from her net and cooked them alive. When she invited Naropa to eat, he said: "Since I am a Bhikshu I no longer have an evening meal, and besides that I do not eat meat." Thinking, "I must have violated the doctrine of the Buddha to be asked to dine by an old woman who cooks fish and frogs alive," he sat there miserably. Then the old man came up with an ox on his shoulders and asked his wife: "Have you prepared some food for the Bhikshu?" She replied: "He seems to be stupid; I cooked some food, but he said that he did not want to eat."

Then the old man threw the pan into the fire while fish and frogs flew up into the sky. He said:

Fettered by habit-forming thoughts, 'tis hard to find the Guru.
How will you find the Guru if you eat not This fish of habit-forming thoughts, but hanker
After pleasures (which enhance the sense of ego)?
Tomorrow I will kill my parents.

He then disappeared.

After his recovery Naropa came upon a man who had impaled his father on a stake, put his mother into a dungeon, and was about to kill them. They cried loudly: "Oh son, do not be so cruel." Although Naropa was revolted at the sight, he asked the man whether he had seen Tilopa, and was answered: "Help me to kill the parents who have brought me misfortune and I will then show you Tilopa."

But since Naropa felt compassion for the man's parents, he did not make friends with this murderer. Then with the words:

> You will find it hard to find the Guru
> If you do not kill the three poisons that derive > From your parents, the dichotomy of this and > that.
> Tomorrow I will go and beg.

the man disappeared.

When Naropa had recovered from his swoon and gone on in prayer, he came to a hermitage. One of the inmates recognized him as Abhayakirti and asked: "Why have you come? Is it to meet us?"

"I am merely a Ku-su-li-pa, there is no need for a reception."

The hermit, however, did not heed his words and received him with due honours. Asked for the reason for his coming, Naropa said: "I seek Tilopa. Have you seen him?"

"You will find that your search has come to an end. Inside is a beggar who claims to be Tilopa."

Naropa found him within sitting by the fire and frying live fish. When the hermits saw this, they began angrily to beat the beggar, who asked: "Don't you like what I do?"

"How can we when evil is done in a hermitage?"

The beggar snapped his fingers, said "Lohivagaja," and the fish returned to the lake. Naropa, realizing that this man must be Tilopa, folded his hands and begged for instruction. The Guru passed him a handful of lice, saying:

> If you would kill the misery of habit-forming > thoughts

And ingrained tendencies on the endless path
To the ultimate nature of all beings,
First you must kill (these lice).

But when Naropa was unable to do so, the man disappeared with the words:

You will find it hard to find the Guru
If you kill not the louse of habit-forming thoughts,
Self-originated and self-destructive.
Tomorrow I will visit a freak show.

Dejectedly Naropa got up and continued his search. Coming to a wide plain, he found many one-eyed people. a blind man with sight, an earless one who could hear, a man without a tongue speaking, a lame man running about, and a corpse gently fanning itself. When Naropa asked them if they had seen Tilopa, they declared:

"We haven't seen him or anyone else. If you really want to find him, do as follows:

"Out of confidence, devotion, and certainty, become A worthy vessel, a disciple with the courage of conviction.
Cling to the spirituality of a Teacher in the spiritual fold,
Wield the razor of intuitive understanding as the viewpoint,
Ride the horse of bliss and radiance as the method of attention, Free yourself from the bonds of this and that as the way of conduct.
Then shines the sun of self-lustre which understands
One-eyedness as the quality of many,
Blindness as seeing without seeing a thing,

Deafness as hearing without hearing a thing, Muteness as speaking without saying something,
Lameness as moving without being hurried, Death's immobility as the breeze of the Unoriginated (like air moved by a fan).

In this way the symbols of Mahamudra were pointed out, whereafter everything disappeared."

[Ibid., pp. 30-36]

In the teachings proclaimed by the Kagyu lineage, we find a lot of processes that have to be gone through and understandings that have to be developed. This is by no means easy. It is extremely difficult to understand that there is some basic confusion we have created, and that within that confusion there is also some kind of madness. Strangely enough, the madness is not confused. There is sanity in the confusion and the madness. Confusion in dealing with the situation of life a fixed thing seems to be a sane approach. So what seems to be insane is enlightenment.

Naropa's approach to his successive discoveries in his visions - or whatever they are, phantoms that he sees - is connected with his seeming sanity. Because Naropa was born a prince and was educated and became a professor at Nalanda University, he regards himself as a sensible person, an educated, sensible person, someone highly respected. But this sensible quality, this sanity of his, turns out to be a very clumsy way of relating with the teachings of Tilopa - the teachings of the Kagyu lineage. Because he was not enough of a freak, because he was not insane enough, he couldn't relate with them at all.

Insanity in this case is giving up logical arguments, giving up concept. Things as they are conceptualized are not things as they are. We have to try to see within the conceptualized situation, according to which fire is hot and the sky is blue. Maybe the sky is green; maybe fire is cold. There's that possibility, always.

When we hear someone say such a thing we become extremely perplexed and annoyed. We think: "Of course fire is hot; fire is not cold. Of course the sky is blue, not green. That's nonsense! I'm not going to have anything to do with that kind of nonsense. I'm going to stick to my sensible outlook. The sky is blue and fire is hot; that gives me a sense of security, satisfaction, and sanity. If fire is hot, I'm quite happy with it. If the sky is blue, I'm also happy with that. I don't want any interference with my regular line of thought."

On the other hand, the idea of insanity we are looking into here does not mean that you should drop your ordinary sanity and be swinging and hip, to use current conventional terms. I am not saying you should change your entire perspective around, that instead of being clean, you should be dirty because that's a more hip way to behave, or that you should adopt any of the rest of that kind of approach. That is not quite the point. People might think that Naropa's hang-up was that he was not hip enough to experience Tilopa's doctrine or teaching. That is not quite so. There is a problem in communicating this situation to late-twentieth-century-Americans. We have an enormous problem there.

One of the biggest problems we face is the popularity of Tibetan Buddhism and Tibetan Buddhist works of art. Everything is regarded as fabulous, a fantastic display. "It is so fantastic! It matches what I saw in my acid trip! It's fabulous!" Looking at it with this attitude, the style of Naropa and his hang-ups and the style of Tilopa and his teachings might be seen as pop art, with people just thinking, "It's a far-out thing." Tibetan wrathful deities in paintings and thangkas demonstrate a crazy-wisdom quality, which is pop art from the point of view of those who regard connecting with the teachings as a hip thing to do.

There are problems with that. Take the example of going into retreat in a cabin in the woods under severe conditions. That should not be regarded as an alternative form of luxury. The retreat cabin you meditate in has nothing to do with your reaction against your central-heated home or your penthouse. It has nothing to do with that at all. It just provides another life situation, and that's all. Meditating in retreat in a cabin in the remote countryside is not pop art. The same is true for visualizing all kinds of deities and mandalas as some American students have been instructed to do. The first impact on them seems to be: "At last I am able to relate with those beautiful, colorful, groovy things that are in the Tibetan thangkas. At last I have managed to get to relate with that. At last the dream comes true, and I am able to live real pop art. I'm not only thinking of them or painting them; by visualizing, I'm becoming part of them. It's an exciting, outlandish thing to do." It's a kind of pop art.

To come back to Naropa, this seems to be precisely Naropa's hang-up. He had so much fascination about Tilopa and receiving the tantric teachings from him that he also looked at it as the next groovy thing to do. And he walked and walked and walked and went on and on. But at each point he got hit because he regarded the whole thing as pop art according to the conception of that particular age. And it is possible that we ourselves might experience the same kind of situation as well, if we impulsively regard the whole thing as pop art - as colorful, inspiring, and, at the same time, artistic. As long as we regard it as something we might tune into at any time, whenever we like, thinking that as soon as we do, it will relieve us from all our pressures and tensions - as long as we regard it as another escape, another sidetrack - being hit like Naropa could happen to us too.

All the successive situations that Naropa went through in experiencing Tilopa's different qualities - the leper woman, the decaying dog, the criminal, and so on - involve a psychological expectation that is an extremely confused one. And we try to make pictures out of that psychological confusion. And the only kind of picture we can come up with is a beautiful, colorful, artistic kind of picture with a dreamy quality connected with possibly achieving a goal, an aim and object. In other words, our picture is connected with the idea of reaching heaven. That seems to be the problem - because such an idea has nothing to do with truth or reality as the Kagyu lineage speaks of it, nothing to do with the mahamudra experience. Such ideas are not real truth. Bliss is not the real truth. Meditative absorption is not the real truth. It seems the real truth is naked and direct, uncolored, unshaded, and not manufactured - the simple existence of a solitary rock - which seems to be extremely boring to experience. We might think,

"If I'm not going to get any excitement or understanding out of experiencing such a truth, what the hell am I getting into this trip for?"

And that seems to be our problem. When we try to get into something, we expect a lot - entertainment, precision, an answer, reassurance, clarity. We expect all kinds of things. By expecting clarity, we are confusing the whole issue; we are producing confusion. By expecting reassurance, by expecting to be reassured that the trip we are getting into is right, we are creating more paranoia. Paranoia and reassurance speak the same language; they're on the same level; they're always interdependent. By looking for precise understanding, we are arousing fear of confusion, we are making more confusion constantly. When we think of bliss, we are making a reference point out of this blissful state, therefore we are arousing fear of pain; we are creating further pain under the pretense of trying to create bliss. These are the things that Naropa experienced in his search for Tilopa. And that is also what we are experiencing. That is what generally happens. We try to grasp every situation of confusion as fast as possible; we grasp it, dwell on it, make it into a mother, suck as much milk as possible out of it, dwell further on it, bounce on it.

In a sense it is beautiful that we can relate to Naropa's confusion as our confusion. It is extremely beautiful that we can relate with him. We can also relate with his understanding. We ourselves could become like Naropa, the father of the Kagyu lineage. This whole room we are in together is filled with potential Naropas, because the whole room is filled with the potentiality of Naropa's confusion. It is quite beautiful.

It seems that in relation to the whole thing we are talking about, Naropa's attainment of enlightenment is not that important. It is Naropa's confusion that is important for us as ordinary people. Connecting with that provides a basis for progress, for a step toward understanding. So let us relate with his story that way. All the hang-ups that Naropa experienced, all his imaginations - his visual mind, his auditory mind as he experienced them - are part of our makeup as well. And there are possibilities of stepping out of that confusion.

STUDENT: I am confused by some of the things Naropa was asked to do. Seemingly there shouldn't be any contradiction between a guru's teaching and the Buddha's teaching. And yet in the visions there seem to be a lot of them. For example, asking him to kill lice seems to be a direct contradiction. On the one hand, his "sane," sensible mind is saying, "Don't do this"; on the other, it is saying, "Do this." It seems either way the poor guy turns, he gets cut down. What would have happened if he had killed the lice? He still would have been in violation, so to speak.

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Probably at that moment there was no such thing as lice to be killed. Physically there may have been no lice at all.

S: Still, you're killing, whether it's only a projection or not. If you kill somebody in a dream, isn't that the same as actually carrying out the action?

TR: It's quite different. You're dealing with your own projections in a dream. If you dreamed that you became a millionaire, you wouldn't actually become a millionaire.

S: It still sounds suicidal. Even if the lice aren't there, something exists.

TR: Yes, something exists, which is your projections, your dogma, your resistance, which has to be killed. Of course there is something there; not only something, but the thing is there.

S: If it's killed, you're still left a killer, aren't you?

TR: Attaining enlightenment could be described as killing ego.

S: It sounds suicidal and hence not complete.

TR: It is complete. When you attain enlightenment, the killer of ego is so efficient and precise that ego cannot arise again at all, not even a memory of it. It does a very fine job. When we kill somebody in the literal sense, we cannot kill them completely. We can't kill their name, we can't kill their relatives - something is left. But in killing ego in connection with the attainment of enlightenment, we do a complete job - the name and the concept are killed as well.

S: Sometimes you talk about meditation in terms of making friends with yourself. Is this what you call making friends with yourself?

TR: What self?

S: It just doesn't seem very friendly.

TR: It is the act of a friend, an act of compassion. Ego is murdered out of compassion, out of love. Usually murder takes place out of hate. It is because the murder of the ego is done out of compassion that, quite surprisingly, it is complete. The murder of ego is a complete murder, in contrast to the other kind.

S: Putting it out of its misery.

TR: Not quite. Respecting the misery.

STUDENT: Rinpoche, it sounds as though you're saying we have to go beyond, transcend ego, before we even have the right to get into tantra.

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Go beyond? I think we have to, yes. It seems that in the current situation in America, we are in the stage of being haunted by the lady with the thirty-seven ugly marks as Naropa was. We haven't developed to the next stages of Naropa's search for Tilopa at all yet. We have just stayed at the beginning. At the moment we seem to be just discovering the difference between the words and the sense. The discovery of the word seems to be the sense, but that is not quite the case.

Discovering the words was what Naropa was doing reading that particular book with his back to the sun. Reading a book on logic. We seem to be at that level. So we have a long way to go.

STUDENT: Is each one of these situations that Naropa goes through a step in developing out of his confusion?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Each situation has a different symbolism related with that, yes.

STUDENT: Who is arranging all these visions?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Nobody. It just seems to happen that way.

STUDENT: Rinpoche, could you say more about the madness of insanity you were talking about?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: It is madness beyond the conceptualized point of view of ego. For example, if you are in an outrageous state of hatred and trying to relate with somebody as an object of that hatred, if that person doesn't communicate back to you in terms of hate, you might think he is a mad person. You think he is mad because he doesn't fight you back. As far as you are concerned, that person his mad, because he has lost his perspective of aggression and passion as it should be from the point of view ...

S: From the point of view of samsara?

TR: Yes. From the point of view of samsara, Buddha is mad. There's a story in the Indian scriptures that in a particular country, a soothsayer predicted to the king that there would be seven days of rain containing a substance that would make people mad. Whoever drank the water would go mad. So his whole kingdom was going to go mad. Hearing this prediction, the king collected gallons and gallons of water for his private use to keep himself from going mad. Then the rain fell and everyone else went mad. Then they all began accusing the king of being mad. Finally he gave in and decided to drink the water of madness in order to fit in with the rest of the kingdom. He couldn't be bothered keeping himself "insane."

STUDENT: In the different visions that Naropa has, he doesn't want to do the things he's asked to do, presumably because he thinks they're immoral. So are we to conclude from this that morality and the moral law are purely something that operates in the ego realm, and that an enlightened person in the position of Tilopa follows no moral law?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Tilopa does follow the moral law in its absolute perfection.

S: What does that mean?

TR: The conventional moral law purely has to do with relating with you conscience rather than dealing with situations. Dealing with situations, with what is right and what is wrong in situations, is Tilopa's fashion. If you relate with a situation in terms of your conscience or your perceptions, it means you don't even have any idea of understanding the situation. This seems to be what happens in general in life. You have to try to understand situations as precisely as possible, but there are situations that you regard as bad to understand. For example, if you had to investigate a murder case, you might want to dissociate yourself from the case altogether, thinking, "I don't want to be involved with murder at all." Then you have no way at all of understanding how and why one person murdered the other. You could let yourself become involved with that murder case and try to understand the rightness and wrongness of what was done as scientifically as possible. You could look into the situation in terms of cause and effect and gain some understanding of it. But on the other hand, if you think, "Becoming involved with murder will just get me in contact with bad vibrations, so I'll have nothing to do with that," then you seal yourself off completely.

That is exactly the same thing that seems to be happening in present-day society. Particularly the young generation doesn't want to have anything to do with society - let alone understand it - because it's something ugly, something terrible. This creates tremendous confusion and conflict. Whereas if people were to get into society and try to understand what is wrong, there might be some intelligence coming out of that. Complete rejection without discrimination seems to be the problem.

STUDENT: So should we register to vote?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Why not? Add your energies to the country's.

STUDENT: Don't you think there have been some things we've all learned from that rejection you were just talking about?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Yes and no - both. A lot of people have rejected Christianity and gone to Hinduism or Buddhism. They feel that they no longer have any associations with Christianity at all. Then later - from the point of view of aliens - they begin to realize that Christianity speaks some kind of profound truth. They only see that from the point of view of aliens, having gone away. They begin to appreciate the culture they were brought up in. Finally they become the best Christians, people with much more understanding of Christianity than ordinary Christians.

You can't reject your history. You can't say that your hair is black if it is blond. You have to accept your history. Those wanting to imitate Oriental culture might go so far as to become 100 percent Hindu or 100 percent Japanese, even to the point of undergoing plastic surgery. But somehow denying your existence - your body, your makeup, your psychological approach - does not help. In fact, it brings more problems. You have to be what you are. You have to relate to your country, its politics, its culture. That is extremely important, since you cannot become someone else. And it is such a blessing.

If we could become someone else, or halfway someone else, that would provide us with a tremendous number of sidetracks and possibilities for escape. We should be thankful that we have a body, a culture, a race, and a country that is honestly ours, and we should relate with those. We can't reject all that. That represents our relationship to the earth as a whole, our national karma, and all the rest of it. That seems to be the starting point for attaining enlightenment, becoming a buddha, an American buddha.

STUDENT: Rinpoche, Naropa's experiences seem to be all symbols. Can't we go too far in taking everything as a symbol? How do we prevent ourselves from going too far in that sense?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Naropa in a sense failed in this way because he didn't have the chance of relating with Tilopa immediately. For that very reason, he got too much involved in symbolism. The same could apply to us as well. It's not so much a matter of too much symbolism as of too much fascination with the context. For example, you could be completely fooled by a salesman if you're in a shop. The salesman might say, "This is such beautiful material. This is such a functional item. It's of good quality, yet cheap. It's so beautiful; you'll be getting your money's worth." At that point, you can't deny that what the salesman is telling you is the truth. He's absolutely telling the truth. The thing he's trying to sell you does have those good qualities. But if you ended up buying it on the basis of fascination, you might be disappointed afterward, because somehow afterward you're not relating with it on the same level of fascination anymore. You might find at that point that your fascination is rejected by the experience you had in your first glimpse before the salesman began to fascinate you. The whole thing is based on fascination.

S: What I was asking about was if there was a point where one has gone too far in taking experiences as symbolic, a point where the whole thing's a projection.

TR: Yes, that is related with fascination, not being able to relate with yourself. One has to relate to one's whole being rather than just purely dealing with accuracy and beautiful display.

STUDENT: In the Buddhist tradition, after the death of the ego, is there any self left? Does self exist?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: That's a very old question. You see, in order to have the continuity of something, you have to have somebody constantly watching this continuity happening. If you have ego continuing, you also have to have the observer observing that ego is continuing. This is because the whole thing is based on a mirage. If there's no watcher, there's no mirage. If there's a watcher to acknowledge that the mirage exists, there will be a mirage. After enlightenment, there's no watcher anymore; therefore the watcher's object does not exist anymore.

S: Does the being exist after that?

TR: The being is self-consciousness, making sure you are there. And you don't watch yourself being there anymore. It's not a question of whether being exists or does not exist. If you see being as not existing, then you have to watch that, make sure that being does not exist anymore, which is continuing the being anyhow.

S: So in other words, there is a death or an identity after ego death, and the death of ego is the death of confusion about it?

TR: Well, the watcher dissolves so we cannot say yes or no either. It's beyond remark.

STUDENT: Regarding relating with our culture, Alan Watts says that one thing that has given our culture a great neurosis is seeing things in terms of the conflict between good and evil rather than just seeing them as they are. This makes me want to ask you about the Buddhist view of what the devil is or the black magician. A lot of our cultural history that is still going on has to do with black magic.

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Defining good and evil or the devil and black magic is very much related to our topic of sanity and insanity, and the whole subject of meditation is related with that as well. The result of any situation that is connected with self-enrichment, or an attempt at self-perpetuation, either in an ego-centered way or a very innocent and kind way - the result of anything aimed at enriching the ego - is destruction, complete confusion, perpetual confusion. There is no killing of ego here. From a black magician's point of view, you don't kill somebody's ego, you kill somebody's non-ego.

TR: You just do it out of conviction, belief. In other words you can't destroy it completely, but you put a smear of ink over it, and you don't look again; you just hope for the best - that you killed it. The whole thing is connected with spiritual materialism, which I talk so much about. Spiritual materialism means enriching the ego. Anything related with spiritual materialism is a step toward the black magician, if I may say so. It could be a step toward the black magician or the white magician actually, but in any case toward the magician, toward gaining power. If you want to help your friend, you just do it. If you want to destroy your enemy, you just do it. In that way, you have the potential of the black magician, even if you are regarded as a kind person who is at the same time a powerful person.

The whole question is how much the relationship with ego becomes a central theme in spiritual practice. When it does, you get good and bad, what is and what is not, which is called duality in Buddhist terminology. The whole thing of who you are is purely related with the watcher. You can't measure anything without a starting point. And you can't count unless you can start from zero. So zero is you, ego. You start from there and you build your number series, you build your measurement system, you build your relationships. Once you do that, you get an overwhelming sense of good and kind or bad and destructive. You build all kinds of things based on that basic reference point. It seems that the whole thing is based on how much you are involved with ego. That seems to be the basis for defining goodness or wickedness.

STUDENT: What are the methods in your way for killing the ego? What methods would you use in our society?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: It has nothing to do wit society at all. It is purely a matter of dealing with one's psychological state of being. Sociological styles don't make any difference in this regard. Sociological approaches or styles are just a photograph. The direct way of dealing with ourselves here is getting into the nitty gritty of our whole existence and dealing with excruciating pain and excruciating pleasure as directly as possible. That way we begin to realize that pain and pleasure exist in an expansive, joyful way. So we don't have to nurse anything.

STUDENT: Rinpoche, you spoke of compassion as being bad medicine for ego. Yet Naropa violates our definition of compassion in a number of ways.

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: There are two different types of compassion. There is actual compassion, direct compassion, absolute compassion. Then there is the other kind of compassion that Mr. Gurdjieff calls idiot compassion, which is compassion with neurosis, a slimy way of trying to fulfill your desire secretly. This is your aim, but you give the appearance of being generous and impersonal.

S: What is absolute compassion?

TR: Absolute compassion is seeing the situation as it is, directly and thoroughly. If you have to be tough, you just do it. In other words, idiot compassion contains a sort of opium - constantly trying to be good and kind - and absolute compassion is more literal, more discriminating, and more definite. You are willing to hurt somebody, even though you do not want to hurt that person; but in order to wake that person up, you might have to hurt him or her, you might have to inflict pain.

That is precisely why, in the Buddhist tradition, we don't start with the teaching of compassion, the mahayana, but we start with teaching of the lesser vehicle, the hinayana. In the hinayana you try to get yourself together. Then you start applying your compassion after that, having gotten yourself together, having built the foundation. You can't just work on the level of absolute compassion right from the beginning. You have to develop toward it.

STUDENT: I think you said earlier that one of the obstacles to developing in this way is the need for reassurance. How does one get away from the need for reassurance?

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Acknowledge needing reassurance, acknowledge it as an effigy that looks in only one direction and does not look around. An effigy with one face, possibly only one eye. Doesn't see around, doesn't see the whole situation. Do you see what I mean?

S: The effigy only looks one way. Is this the person who needs reassurance?

TR: Yes, because that reassurance has to be attached to that one situation. Whenever you need reassurance, that means you have a fixed idea of what ought to be. And because of that you fix your vision on one situation, one particular thing. And those situations that are not being observed because of the point of view of needing reassurance, that we are not looking at, are a source of paranoia. We wish we could cover the whole ground, but since we can't to that physiologically, we have to try to stick to that one thing as much as we can. So the need for reassurance has only one eye.

S: And the way to get beyond that one-eyed vision?

TR: Develop more eyes, rather than just a unidirectional radar system. You don't have to fix your eye on one thing. You can have panoramic vision, vision all around at once.

STUDENT: Something like a fish-eye lens,

TRUNGPA RINPOCHE: Something like that, but even that has a camera behind it.

This is an information sheet about the International Meditation Centres in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin

There are five Centres all with the same course structure in this Tradition. IMC-UK, IMC-WA, IMC-NSW, IMC-USA and IMC-Austria.

The International Meditation Centres were founded to provide for the instruction and practice of Theravada Buddhist Meditation. The Centres in the West are direct offsprings of the International Meditation Centres of Yangon, Myanmar (former Burma), which was founded by Sayagyi U Ba Khin. In addition to being a highly respected meditation teacher, Sayagyi U Ba Khin was the first Accountant General of Burma after Independence in 1948.

All Centres are guided by Mother Sayamagyi and Sayagyi U Chit Tin, two of Sayagyi U Ba Khin's closest disciples, who have practised and taught meditation for more than forty years and have carried on the tradition since Sayagyi's demise in 1971.

Ten-day residential courses are held usually once a month at IMC-UK and regularly at other Centres, beginning on Friday evening and ending early on Monday morning. They are led by Mother Sayamagyi and Sayagyi U Chit Tin or by a regional teacher.

The students who come to do courses at the Centres are from all walks of life, professions, religions, cultural backgrounds, races and countries. Anyone who comes with an open mind can gain the necessary confidence in the technique and in himself or herself. Thus, all can attain benefits which will be proportionate to the amount of balanced effort they make.

Buddhist meditation is the practice of the Eightfold Noble Path, as taught by the Buddha, which can be divided into three parts. These are: higher training in 1) morality, 2) concentration and 3)wisdom.

1. Morality is the common denominator of all religions. At our Centres, students observe the five precepts of refraining from killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying and the use of drugs or intoxicants. By diligently observing this morality, we develop purity of physical and verbal actions.

2. Beginning with this base, training in concentration is taught (Anapana meditation-mindfulness of breathing). Through learning to calm and control the mind during the first four days, the student quickly appreciates the advantages of a steady and balanced mind.

3. The third training in wisdom or insight is introduced through Vipassana meditation, which is practised throughout the remainder of the period.

Vipassana is a process which enables the student to develop concentration and awareness and, through personal experience, to gain an understanding of the truths of impermanence, suffering and non-self. Practised with diligence the gradual process of mental purification will lead to the end of suffering and to full Enlightenment or Nibbana.

The emphasis is on experiencing directly the truth for oneself by practising the technique. Noble Silence (no unnecessary talk) provides a conducive atmosphere, and discourses given in the morning and evening by the Teachers help to clarify the practice. There are also daily interviews with the Teachers.

There has never been any charge for the Buddha's Teachings. The Teachings have always been passed down from the Buddha, through the Teachers to the students, without any expectation of payment, however, the Trusts/ Associations who are responsible for running the Centre ask each student to contribute towards food and accommodation for a ten-day course (the expected contribution varies according to the standards of each country, for example in the UK it is 140 currently).

Wholesome and tasty vegetarian food in ample quantity is provided, and those who follow a diet for medical reasons will be accomodated as far as possible.

For a person who is genuinely interested, meditation (including Noble Silence) is not difficult. The results of patient practice can be quite astonishing. The day's schedule is neither too servere nor too relaxed but follows the Middle Path. Sayagyi U Ba Khin taught his students to work with "zestful ease".

People from many religions have found the meditation courses helpful and beneficial in their day-today lives.

Please note that the course lasts for ten days. Students should plan to remain for the full ten days without leaving the Centre.

INTERNATIONAL MEDITATION CENTRE

The International Meditation Centres were founded by the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust to promote the practice of Buddhist Meditation according to the Teachings of the BUDDHA.

Ten-day residential courses are conducted regularly in the practice of the Eight-Fold Noble Path as taught by the Buddha, which comprises three stages of training: morality (sila), concentration or control over the mind (samadhi), and wisdom or insight (panna). Instruction in mindfulness of the breath (anapana meditation) is then given for five days, with the aim of quieting and concentrating the mind. The remaining days are devoted to insight meditation (vipassana), whereby students can experience at first hand the essential elements of Buddha's Teaching: the impermanence of all physical and mental phenomena (anicca), the unsatisfactory nature of all conditioned phenomena (dukkha), the absence of a permanent enduring self or ego in beings (anatta).

One should come with the understanding and intention to enter a ten-day retreat. The training, if followed diligently, will result in a calmer mind through the gradual eradication of impurities, and ultimately in the realisation of the `Nibbanic Peace within'.

To achieve a state of mind perfectly attuned and in balance, it is essential to start with a stable and sound base of conduct. For the duration of the training therefore, each student is asked to observe the five precepts as follows:

1. To refrain from killing
2. To refrain from stealing
3. To refrain from sexual misconduct (here total celibacy)
4. To refrain from lying
5. To refrain from the use of intoxicants and drugs

All these instructions are framed in accordance with those of the International Meditation Centre, Yangon(Rangoon) Myanmar(Burma), as established by Sayagyi U Ba Khin.

During the period of training students will have to give up their previous practices, and all spiritual activities including those concerning pseudo-sciences. Students should not wear or bring with them spiritual objects or reading material of any kind.

Observance of noble silence throughout the training period will be very beneficial and conducive to a better appreciation of the teaching. This means that the students should not talk amongst themselves, but they may of course speak to the teachers and managers at any time.

During the daily interview with the teachers students should give a true and accurate account of their experiences.

THE IMPORTANCE OF TRUE BUDDHIST MEDITATION TODAY

Saya U Chit Tin

We prepared the answers to the questions in this booklet in August 1986. Since then, we have revised the text so it can be printed and distributed to our students around the world -- especially new students who are just getting interested in the Buddha Dhamma (the Doctrine taught by the Buddha). They are interested in both the theory and the practice of the Buddha-Dhamma and want to know the most effective approach.

We do not want to mislead people, and we do not want to misrepresent the Buddha-Dhamma, because that would be very harmful both to us and to them. We are true Buddhists. We teach the true Buddha-Dhamma and no other Dhamma (doctrine). We want this to be clear to all prospective students. If they decide not to come because of this -- even if no one comes -- we will be happy. We are happy, of course, if people do come, for, as our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin said, we are givers. Students who work under our guidance are taught the true Buddha-Dhamma. They benefit from these Teachings, and we are able to accumulate good (kusala) actions.

We have never been interested in trying to attract large numbers of students. We follow Sayagyi's example in never distorting the Buddha's Teachings and in never catering to what the students would like to do or like to hear. Seeking popularity and fame are against the principles we follow. It may be that some of the answers we give here do not fully satisfy some people. We have made very effort to keep what we say in line with the Buddha's Teachings as preserved in the Pali texts (the canon, commentaries, and sub-commentaries). As we work to keep the Buddha-Dhamma alive in all its pristine purity, we have never knowingly compromised the Buddha's Teachings in order to appeal to the latest fad or the most up-to-date trend in modern thought. To be precise, our motto is, "We preach what we practise."

We approached Venerable Bhikkhu Bodhi, the editor of the Buddhist Publication Society, Sri Lanka, for his advice, and we are very grateful to him for pointing out certain passages that were perhaps not in line with the spirit and the letter of the Pali texts. We have rephrased those passages. We thank him for his wise and instructive suggestions. We, of course, are entirely responsible for the final version published here.

We only have limited time available for writing Dhamma talks, Dhamma essays, etc., for we have travelled extensively around the world, teaching Buddhist meditation courses and setting up Buddhist meditation centres. We are still travelling today. As in the past, we often find some time even while teaching to work on talks and publications. These answers to questions raised by Mr Flavio Pelliconi were first written at a course-site in the Netherlands (August 26, 1986, Kastel "De Wijchert," Oude Kleefsebaan 119, 6572 AK: Berg en Dal). An Italian translation of that first version was published in Paramita: (Quaderni di buddhismo). Revisions were made exactly five years later on another course in the Netherlands (August 29, 1991, t Zonnehuis, Beekbergerweg 23-25, 7371 EV: Loenen [Gld.]).

Our aim is to share the true Buddha-Dhamma with others. We know from experience that it will bring real benefits and instil true objective values in people's hearts and minds (see our answer to question 6). We do not go around the world trying to convert people of other religions, cultures, etc., to Buddhism. We have something to offer that can help bring the peace and prosperity that the world so desperately needs. We want to share this with everyone who is open to receive it.

Greed or lust (lobha), ill will or anger (dosa), and delusion or ignorance (moha) are more prevalent in the world today than ever before. If they can be reduced somewhat through the practice of the Buddha-Dhamma -- even if only by a tiny fraction -- then we will be happy. We will feel our efforts have been worthwhile and amply rewarded.

Last but not least, we thank Dr William Pruitt for the untiring assistance he has given us throughout all these years in all our efforts of preparing this and other publications in the Dhammadana series and the Dhamma Text series of the International Meditation Centres in the Tradition of Sayagyi U Ba Khin.

May Peace Prevail in the World!
May the Pure Buddha-Dhamma Long Endure!
Truth Will Prevail!

1. What kind of meditation do you teach?

We teach Theravada Buddhist Meditation. I say "we" because my wife, who is popularly known as "Mother Sayamagyi" among the students, also teaches with me.

2. Who was your teacher?

Our teacher was a layman named Sayagyi U Ba Khin. He was the first Accountant General of independent Myanmar (Burma) when the country regained independence from the British in January 1948. He was able to fulfil his responsibilities with distinction as well as discharge his duties towards his family and teach meditation. At one time, he was able to work simultaneously at four full-time posts as head of four departments. Few people will ever be able to live up to such an example, but meditators do find that, thanks to their practice, they are able to function to the best of their ability.

3. How did you come to teach meditation?

My wife and I were privileged to be closely associated with Sayagyi U Ba Khin at the International Meditation Centre in Yangon, Myanmar (Rangoon, Burma). I worked under him in the Accountant General's Office as an accountant, and he started teaching Vipassana in his office in 1951. I was fortunate to learn this practice under his guidance. Many others meditated under him also and in that same year he formed the Vipassana Association. I was one of the ten founding members of this Association, which still functions today. In 1952, the Association founded the International Meditation Centre, Yangon, and began holding ten-day meditation courses each month at the Centre.

My wife and I helped Sayagyi during the ten-day courses -- especially my wife, who, unlike the rest of us, was free without official duties. She was able to assist Sayagyi by taking charge when he went to work at his office. The Burmese students were so appreciative of her teachings that they called her Mother teacher ("Sayamagyi" in Burmese), and Western students have continued to use this name for her.

After Sayagyi's demise in January 1971, we continued to teach at the Centre in Yangon together with the other members of the Vipassana Research Association. The Association is responsible for the Centre as well as for the training.

4. Why have you come to the West?

When our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin was teaching at the Centre, many people from around the world came to do meditation courses under his instruction. After his death in January 1971, many foreigners continued to come to IMC-Yangon to work under our guidance. They were mostly Westerners and of the younger generation rather than more mature people, as had been the case during our teacher's time. Each year they would visit the Centre three to six times, staying seven days in Yangon and travelling back and forth to Bangkok, Thailand. This was because they could only get seven-day tourist visas at that time. They seemed to be competing with each other to see who could meditate the most, and they would spend everything that they managed to save each year in coming to the Centre. Finally, they requested that Mother Sayamagyi and I come out of Burma to teach abroad. "We could easily support you," they said, "and take care of your living expenses and any expenses involved in teaching courses. In this way, we will be able to save some of our earnings and meditate more as well." They were very eager to put forth as much effort as possible in their practice of meditation.

In October 1978, having taught for eight years at IMC-Yangon after Sayagyi's death, we came to the West. When we came out, I was properly accommodated with an appropriate job for my right livelihood. Today, we are based at the International Meditation Centre in the United Kingdom, and we travel to many countries to give courses. [Since this article was written, other bases have been established at the International Meditation Centre in Western Australia, and the International Meditation Center-U.S.A. in Maryland. International Meditation Centres are also being set up in Eastern Australia and Austria.] We have dedicated our lives to passing on the Teachings of the Buddha (the Buddha-Dhamma), and it is very satisfying to see how many people all over the world are benefiting from these Teachings. Sayagyi U Ba Khin saw how important the Buddha-Dhamma is in the world today, and he was anxious that the technique he taught and which proved to be of so much use to lay people, be available to all who were sincere students.

5. How was the International Meditation Centre, U.K., set up?

When we came out of Myanmar in 1978, we conducted ten-day meditation courses, which were organized by the students, at places like the Buddhist Centre in Oxford. Although this site was very good, some of the other places that served for various summer courses were not ideal for our use. So in 1979, the International Meditation Centre, U.K., was founded when the Sayagyi U Ba Khin Memorial Trust (registered in Britain under the Charities Act of 1960) acquired a piece of land with an eighteenth-century country house known as Splatts House. This is located on the edge of a quiet Wiltshire village. It has become a centre for people from all over the world who are seeking enlightenment, awakening, that is to say,

"Nibbanic Peace Within."

The purpose of the Centre is to promote the practice of true Buddhist meditation according to the Teachings of the Lord Buddha. The Centre operates under our guidance with the assistance of a number of our regional teachers who were trained at the Centre under us.

There are many volunteer students who come from various countries of the world to meditate and serve by helping with the various types of work at the Centre. They do everything from cooking, gardening, painting, etc., to managing and secretarial jobs. We are both resident teachers, and we conduct ten-day residential courses which run from Friday evening through Monday morning and which begin on the first and third Friday of each month.

The students and Regional Teachers are from all walks of life, professions, religious backgrounds, races, countries, and cultures. When we are away, teaching courses abroad, one of the volunteer regional teachers will lead the ten-day course. In this way, the Centre can give two ten-day courses each month. There is no fee for the teaching, but students are asked to contribute towards food and accommodation for the ten days. Wholesome and tasty vegetarian food in ample quantity is provided, and those who follow a diet for medical reasons will be accommodated as far as possible. IMC-UK is a direct off-spring of IMC-Yangon, Maymar.

6. What benefits can be derived from this practice?

I will answer this question is two parts: (A) what Theravada Meditation is about, and (B) the benefits to be derived from this meditation.

(A) Theravada Buddhist Meditation has as its goal gaining insight into the true nature of existence. It should be preceded by a readiness to place trust in the Buddha's formulated teachings on the true nature of existence in terms of the Four Noble Truths, Dependent Origination, and the three characteristics of existence (impermanence, suffering, non-self).(1) It means practising the Noble Eightfold Path as it was taught by Buddha Gotama over twenty-five centuries ago in his very first sermon, the Dhamma-cakka-pavattana-sutta: "Setting in Motion of the Wheel of the Dhamma." This Eightfold Path can be divided into three parts: (1) the higher training in Morality (sila), (2) the higher training in Concentration (samadhi), and (3) the higher training in Wisdom (panna).

(1) Morality is the common denominator of all religions. At the Centre, everyone observes the five precepts which all meditation students must follow during ten-day courses. These five precepts are the basic morality for all sincere Buddhists. They include refraining from the five major sorts of wrong actions. We refrain from killing, from stealing, from sexual misconduct (at the Centre and on courses, complete celibacy), from lying, and from the use of drugs or intoxicants. By diligently observing this morality, we develop purity of physical and verbal actions. This is the base and without it there cannot be good concentration. A person who lives a moral life will find that he is not distracted by feelings of guilt or worries that his misdeeds will be discovered. A moral person will be able to work effectively at gaining control over his mind.

(2) Concentration: After beginning with this base of morality, training in concentration is taught. The method used is Anapana Meditation-mindfulness of breathing. Through learning to calm and control the mind during the first four days, the student quickly appreciates the advantages of a steady and balanced mind. If your concentration is not good, you can never obtain insight or wisdom (panna).

(3) Wisdom, Insight: The third part of the training is acquiring wisdom or insight through Vipassana Meditation, and this is practised throughout the remainder of the ten days. Once the mind is concentrated, the meditator can use his mind to develop wisdom. Vipassana is a process which enables the student to develop concentration and awareness, and, through personal experience, to gain an understanding of the truths of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anatta). Practised with diligence, the gradual process of material and mental purification will lead to the end of suffering and to full awakening or Nibbana. This is, in brief, what Buddhist Meditation is about.

The emphasis is on experiencing directly the truth for oneself by practising the technique. Noble Silence (no unnecessary talk) provides an atmosphere conducive to working correctly, and discourses given in the early morning and evening by the teachers help to clarify the practice. There are also daily interviews with the teachers for more instructions and explanations to clarify the technique.

(B) The benefits to be derived from this meditation: My wife and I have been in this tradition for over thirty years and our many years of experience in teaching meditation, both in Myanmar and abroad, have shown us that true Buddhist meditation can bring innumerable benefits to one and all. In order to explain the benefits or the fruits of meditation, I can best do so by quoting from our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin. In his text, The Real Values of True Buddhist Meditation,(2) he says:

"The fruits of meditation are innumerable. They are embodied in the discourse on the advantages of a Samanera's life, the Samannaphala Sutta. The very object of becoming a Samanera or monk is to follow strictly and diligently the Noble Eightfold Path and enjoy not only the Fruition (phala) of Sotapatti (the first fruition stage), Sakadagami (second fruition stage), Anagami (third fruition stage) and Arahatta (fourth fruition stage), but also to develop many kinds of faculties. A layman who takes to meditation to gain insight into the Ultimate Truth also has to work in the same way, and if his potentials are good, he may also enjoy a share of those fruits and faculties.... With the development of the purity and power of the mind, backed by insight into the Ultimate Truth of nature, one might be able to do a lot of things in the right direction for the benefit of mankind. There are, therefore, definitely many advantages that accrue to a person who undergoes a successful course of training in meditation, whether he be a religious man, an administrator, a politician, a businessman or a student."

My own case may be cited as an example. If I have to say something here about myself, it is with a sincere desire to illustrate just what practical benefits can accrue to a person practising Buddhist meditation, and with no other motive whatsoever. The events are factual and, of course, one cannot deny the facts. I took up Buddhist meditation seriously in January 1937. My life sketch in "Who Is Who" of the Guardian Magazine [Myanmar], December 1961, gives an account of the duties and responsibilities of government which I have been discharging from time to time. I retired from the service of the government on March 26, 1953, on attaining the age of 55, but was re-employed from that date till now(3) in various capacities, most of the time holding two or more separate sanctioned appointments of the status of Head of Department for nearly three years, and on another occasion, four such sanctioned posts simultaneously for about a year.

In addition, there were also a good number of special assignments either as a member of Standing Committees in the Department of the Prime Minister and National Planning or as chairman or member of ad hoc committees. [Then Sayagyi gives a statement showing all the posts held by him. Also appended are the statements showing the facts and figures of his success in various undertakings. He continues:] The results of these undertakings will surely illustrate what "a reservoir of calm and energy" one can create with Buddhist meditation to be used for the building of a "welfare state."

7. Can Buddhist meditation be practised without having Nibbana as the goal?

Sayagyi U Ba Khin taught meditation to people of many different religions. He did not insist that anyone renounce his own creed. The Buddha also taught people according to their capabilities and understanding, and he always suited his discourse to his listeners.

Some of our students come to their first course with rather exotic ideas about meditation -- expecting some mystic visions or unusual emotional experiences. They find that the technique is very down-to-earth and simple. If they have unusual experiences, with the help of the teachers, they soon discover that these are distractions rather than the goal.

Sayagyi U Ba Khin pointed out that Hindus, Muslims, and Christians work to see the Divine Light through developing their concentration (samadhi). In Buddhism, this is known as a mental sign of a concentrated mind. Most people consider this to be very difficult. Sayagyi wrote, "Our experiments, however, show that under the proper guide, the inner peace and purity of mind with light can be secured by one and all, irrespective of their religion or creed. All that is needed is sincerity and a willingness to follow the instructions of the teacher during the period of training."

Here, I wish to quote from the letters of two non-Buddhist students of Sayagyi: (1) Mr A.N. David, Deputy Accountant General, Burma, a leader of the Christian community, wrote in his letter to Sayagyi, dated Sept. 24, 1954:

"The Peace which the world now seeks can be realized to a great extent if each man, woman, and child would seek and achieve peace of mind within themselves. This will contribute to the general peace of mankind. Your supreme desire to teach us the method of attaining purity of mind and to secure inward peace through your system of meditation, which does not affect my religious beliefs, enabled me (i) to realize also the Truth of ever-changing existence; (ii) to constantly secure inward peace through meditation when contaminated in my daily life by the evil forces of this world. For all these invaluable benefits, more precious than gold, I am deeply indebted to you, and also for the guidance you have given me."

(2) Mr A. Muthia, Deputy Accountant General, Burma, a leader of the Hindu community, wrote in his letter to Sayagyi, dated May 30, 1949:

"I pen you these few lines with grateful thanks for your guidance in the matter of spiritual life by showing me the 'Divine Light.' I must confess at the outset that despite all the knowledge (of course not very vast) I may claim to possess in the spiritual field, I was never aware that one could see the light before one's very eyes as I did under your spiritual powers. I was always aware of one fact, viz., that when the spiritual knowledge is translated into practice, mankind can see before the mind's eye the 'Divine Light.' This, I would say, was always theoretical and no one has yet told me that light was seen and that the same could be shown to others.
"Wherever I went, right from Hardwar (near the Himalayas which I visited in October 1942) to Cape Comorin (which I visited in January 1949, while on pilgrimage), I have heard only harangues on philosophy, divinity and metaphysics, but never a word about showing the 'Divine Light.'

"Before approaching you for enlightenment [i.e., to see the light], I questioned myself so many times, whether I was really worthy of it and whether I would succeed. But I was emboldened when I learnt from you that you have succeeded for your disciples, men even of lesser attainments than myself. I therefore took courage to apply to you and I was shown the light...
"Let me conclude by saying that you are doing very useful service for humanity at large -- a contrast with the rest of the human race which is after materialism and self-aggrandizement."

8. What kind of people are your students?

Our students at IMC-Yangon, IMC-UK, IMC-Perth, IMC-USA, and on courses all around the world come from all races, creeds, and many different walks of life. In Yangon, the students ranged from the president of the country to an ordinary office boy, and they were all treated equally and given equal attention in the training. Just as a high-ranking official who has the potential to reach the highest stage in spiritual attainments will reach that state, so too, an office boy with the same potential will reach that stage. In fact, one of Sayagyi's outstanding students was an office boy.

We follow in the footsteps of our teacher, who adhered to the principles discovered by the Buddha, followed by him, and taught by him. Our Western students range from senior citizens to school children, and they are from all walks of life: professors, lecturers, doctors, nurses, teachers, students, businessmen, politicians, administrators, and religious men, etc. As I mentioned already, they are from various religions, races, countries, and cultures. They all come with an open mind and the necessary sincerity and willingness to follow the instructions of the teacher during the period of training. As a result, they all respond well.

9. Do you teach to Eastern and Western people in the same way?

Our ten-day training course is the same everywhere, for the Path to Happiness is the same today as in the time of the Buddha. As I said earlier, students on our courses come from all races, creeds, and many different walks of life. The Buddha taught over 2500 years ago, but his detailed analysis of Ultimate Reality and how to attain it are very modern. We can see from the Buddhist texts in the Pali language that human nature is still the same. People then and now, people from East or West are caught up in the net of suffering because of their ignorance, desires, and aversions. They are looking for happiness. And the Path to Happiness is the same today as in the days of old.

10. Do you think that this technique is apt for the Western mind?

As I said, the technique is the same for Eastern and Western minds. No modifications are needed to adapt the technique to the Western mind. The fundamentals of human nature are the same for people all over the world. The Buddha pointed out that some people could live anywhere from one year to a hundred years free of physical illness. But the person who is free of mental illness even for a moment is rare indeed. It is only through learning to control the mind and then using that control to discover the true nature of our own existence that we can come out of our mental illness.

11. What kind of difficulties do Westerners usually encounter during the practice?

Taking refuge in the Triple Gem is an essential preliminary to practising the Buddha's Teachings. This is the aspect that can be the most difficult one to accept by Western students. As Sayagyi said to a Westerner who wished to come meditate under his guidance:(4) taking refuge is "a prelude to the goal of meditation. It is here that the setback comes for not a few. A strong determination is therefore necessary to discard the religious elements which are rooted in him, if he means to go the whole way in Buddhist Meditation, and you should be prepared for this." Many students are willing to give Buddhist meditation a fair trail, and they repeat the words for taking refuge when they are asked to do so at the beginning of a ten-day course, but this does not mean that they are fully committed and have placed complete trust in the Triple Gem. Many of them, however, go on to do several courses. Gradually, their attitude changes and they become true Buddhists. We can see the change, for example, when they give their religion as Buddhist on their registration forms. A number of the men among our students have also ordained in Yangon and in the West as Bhikkhus (monks) for short periods, as is the custom for Buddhist men in Yangon.

I have said that the practice is the training in Morality, Concentration and Insight or Wisdom. To get good concentration, morality has to be perfect, since concentration is built upon morality. For good insight, through appreciating the changing nature in the body and the mind, concentration must be good. If concentration is excellent, awareness of the changing nature (anicca) of all conditioned phenomena will also be excellent. That is how our teacher Sayagyi explains the practice in one of his talks.

From this, we can see how morality plays an important role, as it lays the foundation for building up good concentration. The background of many of the Western students is weak in morality. They do not know the importance of observing the five precepts. Just as it is impossible to construct a huge building without a proper strong foundation -- for without the proper foundation, the building will not stand -- so too concentration cannot be developed without strong morality. The first part of the training is working on mindfulness of breathing (anapana-bhavana), and for this the students find they have difficulties.

To begin with, they have problems with the sitting posture. They cannot sit cross-legged. We provide them with cushions to sit on, and if they are sick or elderly, we allow them to sit on a chair at the back of the room to avoid disturbing the other students. But after a few days' training, they are able to overcome these difficulties.

Secondly, people in the West find it difficult to refrain from communicating with each other through conversations. So when they are told to observe Noble Silence, some are against it. At one time, we were teaching in a country like Italy and the students came to us and said, "How can we live without talking! It is impossible; we can't observe this rule." After saying this, they tried talking quietly behind our backs, and we pretended not to see them. And that worked, though they found their meditation was not good. They complained at our checking time that their minds were always wandering and that there was a lot of chattering in their minds all the time. When you talk too much and think too much, your talk and thoughts will come back when you meditate. The students understood through their own experience and stopped talking and thinking and thus got good concentration after much struggle.

During Vipassana meditation, most students find it easy to work, unlike Anapana, because the technique used in this tradition is to concentrate on each part of the body in a systematic fashion and to note whatever sensation, if any, is occurring in that part of the body. At the same time, you must be aware that the sensation is impermanent (anicca). We move the attention through the body, being aware of the sensations from head to foot.

Under the guidance of a qualified teacher, it is possible that the student will learn the technique quickly and feel the sensations throughout the whole body together with the appreciation of their inherent changing nature (anicca). For the average, normal person, the technique works very well, and there will be no difficulty. But those who have previously followed other practices, spiritual or otherwise-especially those concerning pseudo-sciences, low arts, wearing or adorning themselves with special amulets such as beads and strings, etc. -- can find the technique difficult. If they can give up their previous practices and surrender or leave at home any special amulets, then they can enjoy the fruits of the practice. These instructions, like all our instructions, apply for the period of training when the students put themselves under our guidance. After that, it is up to each individual to decide how much of what they have learned they will put into practice in their day-to-day lives. All we ask is that the students come with an open mind and give a fair trial to the technique. This means having a certain amount of confidence and working without entertaining doubts; otherwise, the students will not benefit from the training.

Success depends on these four qualities: (1) Concentration of Intention (chanda-samadhi), (2) Concentration of Energy (viriya-samadhi), (3) Concentration of Consciousness (citta-samadhi), and (4) Concentration of Investigation (vimamsa-samadhi). We need strong intention, zeal, to reach the goal. It takes a great deal of energy, good concentration, and we must use our concentration to discover the truth for ourselves.

For progress in meditation, the following are the essential requirements: (1) Confidence in the teacher, (2) Strict adherence to the instructions and the rules of discipline at the meditation camp, (3) The ability to work hard in a balanced way, and (4) The capacity to appreciate and understand the Teachings in practice. When these qualities are present there will be no difficulty and you will obtain the benefits of the practice.

12. Do Eastern students encounter similar difficulties?

In answer to question number ten I told you that the fundamentals of human nature are the same for people all over the world -- so most of the difficulties are the same. People in the East are used to getting up early in the morning, so they will find it easy to get up at 4 A.M. each day on the course. Westerners may have a little difficulty with this at the beginning, but they soon adapt to the training. A Westerner may find it a little difficult to sit cross-legged on the floor at the start, but we have found that for this too adjustment is quick. Sometimes vegetarian food can be a problem for students with stomach troubles, but this problem is common to both those in the East and in the West. Adjustments in the diet to accommodate the students can be made. So you can see that the differences are very few -- not enough to say that they are of any real importance.

13. There is a certain tendency to separate the practice of meditation from the practice of morality. What do you think about this?

What we are practising is the Noble Eightfold Path, which I have already pointed out is divided into three parts: Morality, Concentration, and Wisdom or Insight. Sayagyi U Ba Khin wrote, "Sila or virtuous living is the base for samadhi, control of the mind to one-pointedness. It is only when Samadhi is good that one can develop panna. So, sila and samadhi are the prerequisites for panna ..." Now, how could this Noble Path be separated?

The Buddha taught the Middle Path. This Middle Path is clearly laid out in his first sermon. If we are to walk along the Middle Path, which leads to true happiness, we must find the correct path. The Buddha taught that the Middle Path avoids two extremes that must be given up by anyone who has gone forth in search of Awakening or Enlightenment: (1) There is the extreme that is connected with sensual desire, including sensual pleasures such as taking intoxicants, sexual misconduct, etc. (2) The other extreme is subjecting oneself to rigorous austerities. So we can see that the Middle Path does not mean we can indulge in unwholesome actions in moderation -- only drinking intoxicants from time to time, for example. Nor should we fall into the trap of thinking that the more difficult and painful our practices are the better they are. We must correctly identify the two extremes and find the balanced approach in the middle.

If a person tries to separate the practice of meditation from the practice of morality, that person is distorting the Teachings and misrepresenting the Buddha. This is very serious indeed. Such a person will earn great demerit and will come to ruin.

The Buddha said:

"There are some foolish men who study the teachings but do not examine the purpose of the teachings wisely. In such cases, these teachings will not give insight. Such people study the teachings only to use them for criticizing or for refuting others in disputation. They do not experience the true purpose for which they ought to study the teachings. For those who wrongly grasp the teachings there will be harm and suffering for a long time."

And then the Buddha taught the Snake Simile:

"Suppose a man who wants a snake goes in search of a snake. And then when he sees a big snake he grasps it by its body or by the tail. The snake will turn back on him and bite him. Because of that, he will suffer death or deadly pain. All because he grasped the snake incorrectly. In the same manner those who wrongly grasp the teachings will suffer for a long time due to their wrong understanding of the teachings.
"But there are those of good families who study the teaching and having studied it, they examine wisely the purpose of the teachings. To them the teachings will bring insight. To them the teachings will bring welfare and happiness for a long time because they grasp them correctly."

The Buddha goes on with the example of the man who catches the snake correctly by the neck. It may coil around his arm or hand, but he will not suffer death or deadly pain -- all because he grasps the snake correctly. Those who grasp the Teachings correctly are like that man. Then the Buddha concluded this example by saying, "Therefore, monks, if you understand what I have said, you should keep it in mind. But if you do not understand, you should ask me about it or ask those monks who are wise." So, this is a very good question, and we should let ourselves be guided by the words of the Buddha.

14. Can one practise Vipassana Meditation and maintain one's own creed?

In your seventh question you asked whether it is possible to practise Buddhist Meditation without having Nibbana as the goal. As you know, Nibbana is the goal of every Buddhist, so those who do not have Nibbana as their goal are not Buddhists, of course, and they can maintain their own creed. The answer given to question seven is relevant to this question. As you can see from the two letters that two of Sayagyi's disciples sent him, they clearly stated that they benefited through this practice (especially Anapana meditation), even though they still maintained their own creeds. As the Christian leader said, he was able to practice Buddhist meditation as taught by Sayagyi, working for purity of mind and inward peace without it affecting his religious beliefs. He was able to obtain a certain degree of appreciation of the truth of "ever-changing existence" and "to secure inward peace, constantly (meditating) when contaminated in (his) daily life by the evil forces of this world." This positive statement is a good testimony to the confidence a member of another religion can have in Buddhist Meditation, and it shows it is possible to practise it without giving up one's own creed.

A person from another religion will especially be able to practise in order to attain good concentration (samadhi). When a person begins to develop an appreciation of the true nature of conditioned existence through insight (vipassana), progress will be limited by any beliefs they may hold that go against what they are experiencing. Sayagyi's approach, which is in accord with the way the Buddha taught, was to explain to students of meditation that they would only be able to make limited progress if they did not take unconditional refuge in the Triple Gem.

Some of Sayagyi's students from other religions were happy with limited success. But some students gained good insight into the three characteristics of conditioned existence. Such people understood for themselves that they needed to take refuge only in the Triple Gem. When you see for yourself why taking refuge is essential, you will do so. Only then will a person be able to realize his or her full potential. We saw such cases ourselves at IMC-Yangon working under Sayagyi's guidance.

15. What is your advice to Italian readers?

In answer to your question, let me quote from an article which I contributed to the Guardian, a Burmese magazine, in the issue dated January 19, 1972, the first anniversary of the demise day of our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin. The title of the article was "Can Buddhism Provide the Answer?"

In my article, I said that everyone in the world is looking for ways and means to be happy -- they are in quest of happiness. I said that affluence and the attainment of success in life are not the real answer, nor can drugs and alcohol provide a panacea for aching hearts.

Young minds in the Western world are now probing for a satisfactory answer. Disillusioned with war, tired of the hypocrisy of politicians, dissatisfied with the weakness of the conventional forms of worshipping, some young people have experimented with Zen, some have toyed with Yoga, some simply turned into angry young men, and others just fell by the wayside, hugging their pot and pep pills. Quite a few turned into hippies, yippies, pseudo-philosophers, barefooted nomads-unshaved, unbathed, and sometimes unclothed. And they have picked up hashish, which only the down-and-out coolies (manual labourers) used to smoke in pre-war days in Burma, and imagined themselves to be "groovy people doing their own thing."

Burma does not need pot and pep pills to face the vicissitudes of life. For centuries we have had our religion -- Theravada Buddhism -- to give us equilibrium, equanimity, and endurance in life .... So, isn't it about time that our country should give to those unhappy people in the West some of our tranquillity and the peace which our religion has bestowed upon us?

This reminds us of the efforts of champions among the Burmese Sangha and laymen who were pioneers in spreading the light of the Dhamma to other countries. Among these "missionaries," the late Sayagyi U Ba Khin, founder of IMC-Rangoon, who died on Jan. 19, 1971, really blazed the trail when he trained a chosen handful of Westerners and Easterners in Vipassana and sent them out to disseminate Buddhist Meditation.

One of Sayagyi's disciples, who was a professor of philosophy and religion at Grinnell College in the U.S.A., and who took a meditation course under Sayagyi in 1958, put it in a nutshell when he described U Ba Khin thus: "He was thoroughly Burmese and truly Buddhist. As to his Burmeseness -- he loved Burma and felt at home there. In his love of Burma there was no disparagement or disdain for other countries, peoples, or cultures, only a joyful and willing acceptance of his own karmic destiny- he was thankful to have been born in a country where one could encounter the Buddha Dhamma."

I concluded my article by saying that most Burmese people think as Sayagyi U Ba Khin did. Like him, once they have enjoyed the experience of Vipassana, as Burmese Buddhists, they would dearly love to share that experience with those in other parts of the world who are seeking true happiness.

The best advice I can give to Italian readers is from a text written by Sayagyi U Ba Khin himself. In his booklet, The Real Values of True Buddhist Meditation, Sayagyi wrote about the by-products of meditation:

"What I am going to state here concerns the very minor by-products of meditation relating to physical and mental ills. This is not the age for showing miracles, such as rising into the air and walking on the surface of the water which would be of no direct benefit to people in general. But if the physical and mental ills of men could be removed through meditation, it should be something for one to ponder."

He goes on to explain that according to the Teachings of the Buddha, each action -- by thought, word, or deed -- leaves behind a force of action that goes to one's credit or debit account, depending on whether the actions are good or bad. Through Buddhist Meditation, we can develop the "sparkling illumination of Nibbana Dhatu" which is a power that dispels all impurities or poisons.

Among those who have taken courses of meditation at the Centre [in Yangon], there were some who were suffering from complaints such as hypertension, T.B., migraine, thrombosis, etc. They became relieved of these even in the initial course of ten days. If they maintain the awareness of Anicca [impermanence] and take longer courses of meditation at this Centre, there is every likelihood of the diseases being rooted out in the course of time.

And Sayagyi says that Nibbana Dhatu removes the root cause of suffering. Thus, he made no distinction between this or that disease.

Mankind today is facing the danger of radioactive poisons. If such poisons absorbed by a man exceed the maximum permissible concentration (m.p.c.), he enters the danger zone. I have a firm belief that the Nibbana Dhatu which a person in true Buddhist Meditation develops is Power that will be strong enough to eradicate the radioactive poison, if any, in him.

In conclusion, I may state here that the ultimate goal of our practice is Nibbana. The Teaching is a gradual practice, a gradual training, a gradual doing, step by step, or, a gradual Path (anupubbi patipada) that is progressive in nature (opanayiko). As you walk along the Path, you will come to enjoy the fruits of Liberation. It is to be experienced and not to be taken for granted. And it is this dynamic aspect of the Teaching that invites one to come and see (ehi-passiko) its immediate results (akaliko). My Dhamma partner and I are privileged to be able to help people all over the world to work to overcome their suffering, and thus we carry on the mission of our teacher Sayagyi U Ba Khin.

We join him in the following wish:

May All Beings Be Happy!
May Peace Prevail in the World!
Truth Will Prevail!

The Importance of True Buddhist Meditation Today

[end]

INCENSE OFFERING

Incense offering, or Sang-sol, is a ceremony performed by Tibetans from all walks of life to mark important events in their lives. A widespread national custom, it can be preformed individually or in groups, on occasions such as the Dalai Lama's birthday, marriages, third day of the Tibetan New Year, or preceding other important events.

Origins

It is not clear whether the Tibetan custom of offering incense originated in India or not, as only two references to such practice can be found in the Indian texts. It is mentioned in the Guhyasamaja Tantra that one should know about the three kinds of fragrance. The other reference is to be found in the story of Bhadri of Magadha, which tells of how she invited the Buddha to her house and made offerings of smoke to him from the roof.

According to the writings of various scholars, it seems that incense offering was carried out in Tibet from the very early times when the teacher Tonpa Sherab, founder of the Bon religion, first came from Zhang Zhung (Afghanistan/Tadzhikistan?) to spread his doctrine in Tibet.

The oldest extant text on incense offering, dates back to the eight century, when the Indian master Padmasambhava came to Tibet and built Samye monastery. This manual, containing detailed instructions on how to preform the ritual, was then hidden by him to await discovery at some appropriate juncture in the future. Several centuries later, two Treasure masters (tertons), one from northern Tibet and another from the south, discovered and revealed it. based on this Treasure (terma) text many Nyingma, Kagyu and Sakya lamas composed the incense offering. Later at the time of the third Dalai Lama, Sonam Gyatso, a lama by the name of Yeshe Wangpo, wrote a text on the incense offering from the Gelugpa point of view. Subsequently, three works were written on the subject by Panchen Lobsang Chogyen (1570-1662) and another by the fifth Dalai Lama.

The Ritual

The Incense offering should be done in the morning on a clean and elevated outdoor site, free of insects., either on a hill or the top of a house and inhabited by many local gods and nagas.

If performed during a festival, all the inhabitants of a locality may assemble and, at the end of the offering, stand in a row and throw a handful of tsampa (roasted barley flour) in the air. As this is usually a happy occasion, a dance often follows. In the summer, incense offering is often associated with picnics on top of mountains. It is closely linked with the hanging of prayer flags from trees or tall poles, especially on the third day of the new year, but also on other auspicious days.

The incense should be burned in a large urn-shaped burner (sang-khun) and should not have been trampled by people or animals. Wood, not coal, should be used as fuel and the substance to be burned as incense should be fragrant, such as the leaves of fern or juniper, or the branches of coniferous tree, rhododendron, and red or white sandalwood. In addition, tsampa, butter, sugar, and medicinal plants, and other substances free from the taint of alcohol, onion or garlic are burned.

When offering incense, people should examine their motivation and reflect that by making this offering to lamas, meditational deities and religious protectors, they will accumulate merit, which they should dedicate to the benefit of all sentient beings. If they have any specific requests, such as prayers for longevity or the removal of obstacles to religious practice, they should be made at this point. Next the practitioners take refuge, meditate on the four immeasurable wishes, love, compassion, joy, equanimity, and visualize themselves as deities. The objects to be offered are then blessed, rid of their ordinary appearances and transformed by meditation, gestures, and mantras into an inexhaustible source of great bliss which will please those to whom they are offered.

The offering ends with the practitioners asking the deities to forgive them for any mistakes in the performance of the ritual, such as improperly or incompletely reciting the words of the text. the deities are then asked to return to their abodes and auspicious verses are recited.

Incense offering can thus be preformed as an elaborate religious ritual, an offering of a fragrant purified of its ordinary qnalities and appearance to lamas, meditational deities, religious protectors, nagas and local worldly gods. The offering is intended to please the deities, who rejoice at the merit of those making the offering. However, incense offering can also be preformed simply because it is an ancient custom, and a traditional means of purifying the atmosphere. Incense offering is also done to mark the passing away of important people, lamas or officials and in these ways it is a practice common to both Buddhists and Bonpos.

SESSHIN LEADERSHIP: INO ROLE

4.25 a.m. Strike inkin to signal time to drink tea. When all have finished, hit inkin again to signal return of wrapped teacups to place behind zabutons.

6.30 a.m. Ino leads meal chants (after Jiki has responded to umpan with inkin). After the 2 on clappers, Jiki on inkin) which end meals and which are followed by a standing bow, bowls at eye level, participants replace bowl sets, straighten places, turn and stand with hands in kinhin position until Ino rings final inkin to dismiss sangha.

8.30 a.m. Morning sutra ceremony. All sutras are done in order, except Hakuin Zenji's Song of Zazen and the dedication which follows it.

(Note: there are 2 dedications following Sho Sai Myo Kichijo Dharani. We use the First Sutra Dedication during sesshin, the other one during daily practice at Annandale. There are 3 dedications following Kanzeon, "In the purity and clarity of the Dharmakaya" is used at the closing ceremony on the last day of sesshin. "Infinite realms of light and dark" is the daily dedication and "The Buddha and his teachers" is the right one to use during sutra service.)

ll.30 am Ino again leads meal sutras.

l.55 pm Teisho is announced. When Jiki hits drum 3 times at 2.00 p.m.

Ino says, "Please stand" and hits clappers full sound, length-to-length, then muted sound, length-to-end, at 5 second intervals, ideally arriving on a full hit to coincide with arrival of teacher in dojo. As he bows, Ino bows, teacher reaches for incense (Tanto will offer it), Ino puts down clappers and picks up inkin. Hits inkin as teacher bows and begins accelerando for 3 bows, 4th standing bow when teacher is at his seat. He will come to a gassho to signal "On Opening the dharma". Then, after teisho, teacher's gassho signals "Great Vows".

4.25 pm Approx. Jiki will say "Sit facing in for the reading" and Ino will lead the Shodoka. If it is a large sesshin, the Ino should go early to dokusan to be sure to be back in time for this.

5.00 pm Supper. No sutras. Clappers are used to signal the beginning of meal and seconds. Meal ends with the usual clap-dings.

8.50 pm Closing ceremony. Once again, the Ino initiates the 3 bows, timing the inkin to coincide with the teacher's personal bow following his incense offering. When all are seated and sutra books have been passed out, Ino leads Hakuin Zenji's Song of Zazen, followed by "The sky of samadhi" dedication, then Great Vows. The ceremony ends with the Jiki on han and Jisha on densho and Ino on inkin (Bok, Bong, Ding- accelerando) initiating final 3 prostrations. Teacher says his final words, departs, Ino hits inkin, cushions are straightened, then final Inkin to dismiss for the night is hit by Jiki.

Transmission of the Light Case #38 "Teachings of the Insentient"

The Pointer: Followers of the Way, understand clealy that it cannot be given nor can it be received. Yet everywhere I go, I encounter it. Teaching, preaching. It is now me. I now am not it. To see it in this way is to realize being just as it is.

Master Tozan called on Ungon and asked, ÒWho can hear the teaching of insentient beings?Ó Ungon said, ÒIt can be heard by the insentient.Ó Tozan asked, ÒDo you hear it?Ó Ungon said, ÒIf I heard it, you wouldnÕt hear my teaching.Ó Tozan said, ÒIf so, then I donÕt hear your teaching.Ó Ungon said, ÒIf you donÕt even hear my teaching, how much less the teaching of the insentient?Ó Tozan was greatly enlightened at this. He spoke a verse to Ungon: ÒWondrous, marvelous. The teaching of the insentient is inconceivable. If you listen with your ears, you wonÕt understand. When you hear the sound with your eyes, then youÕll know.Ó Ungon approved.

Kazan ZenjiÕs Poem: Extremely subtle mystic consciousness. It is not mental attachment. All the time it causes that to teach in great profusion.

This account of TozanÕs enlightenment experience, and most of the koans Ñ you know, you read that a monk asks the question and then the teacher either answered or shouted, or hit him, or pointed, and the monk was enlightened, and then went on to be a teacher in his own right. It all seems very, very simple, very direct, and why isnÕt it constantly happening? A point, or a shout. Ñ Well, whatÕs not evident in the koans is the years of training that preceded the actual experience. And when that experience happens, itÕs usually at a very critical time, what Maslow called Ôpeak experience,Õ a very ripe time, like the time when the fruit falls from the tree by itself. ItÕs not green and itÕs not overipe Ñ itÕs just the right time. And if you happen to shake the tree right around the right time, the fruit will fall. But if itÕs not ready, no matter how much you shake it, the green fruit still clings. And if itÕs too late, itÕs already fallen to the ground and rotted. ItÕs got to be right at the right moment.

With Tozan, his training goes way back. If you look into the record of Master Tozan, it goes back to when he was a child. Once as a child, reading the Heart Sutra with his tutor (it doesnÕt say how old he was), he came to the line, Òno eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, mind,Ó and immediately he felt his face with his hand and said to his tutor, ÒI have eyes, ears, nose, tongue, and so on; why does the sutra say they donÕt exist?Ó And this took the tutor by surprise and, recognizing that this was an unusual youngster, he said, ÒIÕm not your teacher,Ó and sent him off to the Zen master of one of the nearby mountains. There he took the robe and shaved his head. And then when he was twenty-one, he went to Sung Mountain and took the complete precepts. Probably the first time was when he became a novice monk. And that first master was Master Gosetsu, who was a second-generation teacher in the line of Basso, the great Master Basso.

Then after that taking of the precepts, he set out on a pilgrimage. First he went to visit Master Nansen. Now, this was the golden age of Zen. It was very, very visible in China at the time. Many of the very powerful people of China were supporters of the dharma and the monasteries were the seats of learning. I mentioned once before I had asked my teacher isnÕt it unusual for someone like Basso to have eighty-seven enlightened disciples? Nowadays, if a teacher finds one or two, he considers himself lucky. Basso had eighty-seven. He said you need to understand that at that time in China, there was nothing competing with the monasteries. If you were bright and intelligent and success-oriented, or whatever the things are that draw people into the different professions, the only place to really go . . . there were a handful of places, and one was the monastery. So a lot of the finest minds of the period found themselves in BassoÕs monastery studying with Basso. So that his succession of transmission was enormous, among them some of the greatest masters that every lived, such as Nansen and Yakujo and Mayoku, Bonzan, Daibai. And those resulted in four of the five major lines that emerged in China.

And what was going on is a lot of communication between these two different lineages. There was the Soto lineage on one side, and then there was what later became the Rinzai lineage on the other side, and these two main lineages the monks were visiting back and forth. So there was a lot of cross-fertilization going on. In fact, much in the same way that happens today. I think I counted maybe ten or twelve people in this sesshin who have or are studying with other teachers. So thereÕs like a cross- ? thatÕs happening here too.

So Tozan set out on a pilgrimage and the first place he went was to visit Nansen. Nansen was one of the successors of Basso. So was Master Gosetsu that he took the precepts with. And chances are Gosetsu said why donÕt you go see Nansen, or mentioned Nansen in one of his talks or something. So Tozan went off to see Nansen and when he arrived, preparations were underway for BassoÕs memorial. Basso evidently had died. Basso was NansenÕs teacher.

So Nansen Ñ and I mentioned before that always, everything that we do is the teaching, has to do with the teaching; all of the liturgy that we do has to do with the teaching; everything that we do has one point and one point only and that is to realize the self; so whether weÕre doing an ordination ceremony, a birth ceremony or a death ceremony, or a marriage ceremony, or regular service, or renewal of vows . . . always within it is the teaching; always itÕs pointing; always itÕs, itÕs almost like a koan. Even the sutras that we chant Ñ And so at BassoÕs memorial, Nansen posed the following question to the assembly. He said, ÒTomorrow weÕll pay homage to Master Basso. Do you think he will return or not?Ó

No one offered a reply. So Tozan came forward and said, ÒHe will come, as soon as his companion is present.Ó Nansen said, ÒThis fellow, though young, is suitable for being cut and polished,Ó referring to the diamond ability that he had. Tozan said, ÒTeacher, donÕt crush whatÕs good into something awful.Ó And with that he left.

He next visited Issan, another great master of that period of time. Issan was a successor, I believe, to Master Ubaku, who was also a teacher of Rinzai. No, Issan was a successor of Yakujo, so the same dharma uncle of Master Mo that he took the precepts with. And when he got to Issan, he said to him, ÒI recently heard that the national teacher maintains the doctrine that nonsentient beings expound the dharma. I have not yet comprehended the subtleties of this teaching.Ó

Now, nonsentient beings means rocks and mountains and rivers and trees and buildings and bridges and all things. ÒI have not yet comprehended the subtleties of this teaching.Ó Issan said, ÒCan you remember the details of what you heard?Ó ÒYes I can,Ó said Tozan. ÒThen why donÕt you try to repeat it for me,Ó said Issan.

Tozan began, ÒA monk asked ?-chung, ÔWhat sort of thing is the mind of the ancient buddhas?Õ The national teacher replied, ÔItÕs wall and tile, rubble.Õ ÔWall, tile, rubble? IsnÕt that something thatÕs nonsentient?Õ asked the monk. ÔIt is,Õ replied the national teacher. The monk said, ÔAnd yet it can expound the dharma?Õ ÔItÕs constantly expounding it, radiantly expounding it, expounding it without ceasing,Õ replied the national teacher. The monk asked, ÔThen why havenÕt I heard it?Õ The national teacher said, ÔYou yourself havenÕt heard it, but this canÕt hinder those who are able to hear it.Õ ÔWhat sort of person acquires such hearing?Õ asked the monk. ÔAll the sages have acquired such hearing,Õ replied the national teacher. The monk said, ÔCan you hear it, teacher?Õ ÔNo I canÕt,Õ replied the national teacher. The monk said, ÔIf you havenÕt heard it, how do you know that nonsentient beings expound the dharma?Õ The national teacher said, ÔFortunately, I havenÕt heard it. If I had, I would be the same as the sages and you, therefore, would not hear the dharma that I teach.Õ ÔIn that case, ordinary people would have no part in it,Õ said the monk. ÔI teach for ordinary people, not sages,Õ replied the national teacher. ÔWhat happens after ordinary people hear you?Õ asked the monk. ÔThen they are no longer ordinary people,Õ said the national teacher. The monk asked, ÔAccording to which sutra does it say that nonsentient beings expound the dharma?Õ ÔClearly, you shouldnÕt suggest that itÕs not part of the sutras. HavenÕt you seen it in the Avokatamsa Sutra, where it says the earth expounds the dharma, living beings expound it, throughout the three times everything expounds it.ÕÓ Thus the master completed his narration.

Issan said, ÒThat teaching also exists here; however, one seldom encounters someone capable of understanding it.Ó Tozan said, ÒI still donÕt understand it clearly. Will the master please comment?Ó Issan raised his fly whisk, saying, ÒDo you understand?Ó ÒNo I donÕt. Please, teacher, explain,Ó replied Tozan. Issan said, ÒIt can never be explained to you by means of the mouth of one born of mother and father.Ó Tozan asked, ÒDoes the master have any contemporaries in the Way who may clarify this for me?Ó ÒFrom here, go on to Ungon, a monk who is living in the caves. If you are able to push aside the grass and gaze into the wind, then you will find him worthy of your respect,Ó said Issan.

ÒJust what sort of man is he?Ó asked Tozan. Issan replied, ÒOnce he said to this old monk, ÔWhat should I do if I wish to follow the master?Õ This old monk replied, ÔYou must immediately cut off your defilements.Õ He said, ÔThen will I come up to the masterÕs expectation?Õ This old monk replied, ÔYouÕll get absolutely no answer as long as IÕm here.ÕÓ

So then Tozan left Issan and proceeded directly to Ungon and found him, as he expected, living in a cave in one of the mountains. Making reference to his previous encounter with Issan, he immediately asked, ÒWhat sort of person was able to hear the dharma expounded by nonsentient beings?Ó Ungon said, ÒNonsentient beings are able to hear it.Ó ÒCan you hear it, teacher?Ó asked Tozan. Ungon replied, ÒIf I hear it, then you would not be able to hear the dharma that I teach.Ó ÒWhy canÕt I hear it?Ó asked Tozan. Ungon raised his fly whisk and said, ÒCan you hear it yet?Ó Tozan replied, ÒNo I canÕt.Ó Ungon said, ÒYou canÕt even hear when I expound the dharma; how do you expect to hear when nonsentient beings expound the dharma?Ó And then Tozan asked, ÒIn which sutra is it taught that nonsentient beings expound the dharma?Ó Ungon replied, ÒHavenÕt you seen in the Avokatamsa Sutra, it says water, birds, trees, groves, all without exception recite the BuddhaÕs name, recite the dharma.Ó Reflecting on this, Tozan composed the following gatha. ÔHow amazing. How amazing. Hard to comprehend that nonsentient beings expound the dharma. It simply cannot be heard with the ear. But when the sound is heard with the eye, then itÕs understood.Õ

Two different masters, two completely different lineages, separated by many, many miles Ñ these werenÕt monasteries next door to each other; they were in the northern and souther, almost as if they had gotten it from the same source. ThatÕs the true dharma. It doesnÕt change, the teaching doesnÕt change. The methods of presenting it may be different. There are things that Buddha had to do, in accord with the circumstances that existed in India 2,500 years ago, that definitely wouldnÕt work here, today, in America. Other things had to happen in China because of the circumstances that existed there, again in Japan, and again here. And even though on the surface it may seem different, when you really see whatÕs being said, itÕs exactly the same: that truth, that principle, that great matter thatÕs been realized by all the buddhas and ancestors, the men and women who have preceded us, remains the same, the same truth. And that truth is each of our own lives. ItÕs not something that comes from the outside. ItÕs not something that can be given.

ThatÕs what makes it so difficult to teach, because you actually canÕt teach it. To teach implies some sort of giving and receiving, some sort of communication, and thatÕs not the case. We already have it. It needs to be uncovered, it needs to be realized. And so these extraordinary methods are resorted to in order to get the student to turn it around themselves. Anything less than that would make the student some sort of a prisoner of the teaching or the teacher. And thatÕs not what the teaching is about; itÕs about liberation, your liberation.

It didnÕt end here for Tozan. It continued. Because after this conversation, he said, ÒI still have some habits that are not yet eradicated.Ó Ungon said, ÒWhat have you been doing?Ó Tozan said, ÒI have not concerned myself even with the four noble truths.Ó Ungon said, ÒAre you joyful yet?Ó Tozan said, ÒIt would be untrue to say I am not joyful; itÕs as though I have grasped a bright pearl in a pile of shit.Ó Tozan asked Ungon, ÒWhen I wish to meet you, what shall I do?Ó Ungon answered, ÒMake an inquiry with the official,Ó replied Ungon. The official interpreter Ñ itÕs kind of like the secretary of state. Tozan said, ÒIÕm inquiring right now.Ó ÒWhat does he say to you?Ó asked Ungon.

And it goes on. He stayed with Ungon for quite awhile and then, just before leaving him - taking his leave, going off on his own Ñ Tozan asked, ÒIf after many years someone should ask if IÕm able to portray the masterÕs likeness, how shall I respond?Ó To portray the masterÕs likeness means to have developed an intimacy with the teacher; in other words, to have received the transmission from the teacher. ItÕs said that only a person who has received from the teacher his likeness, is able to transmit that teacherÕs dharma. After remaining quiet for awhile, Ungon said, ÒJust this person.Ó

And that word Ôjust this personÕ Ñ thereÕs an interesting footnote that has to do with the Chinese word Ôjust this person.Õ The characters for it means Ôjust this man of Han,Õ and according to medieval Chinese legal custom, this is the phrase by which a criminal formally confessed his guilt in court. If you wanted to say you were guilty, you didnÕt say Ôguilty,Õ you said Ôjust this man of Han.Õ So what he was saying, in a sense, is: ÒAfter many years, if someone should ask me if IÕm able to portray the masterÕs likeness, how shall I respond?Ó and after remaining quiet for awhile, Ungon said, ÒGuilty.Ó

Tozan was lost in thought. Ungon said, ÒHaving assumed the burden of this great matter [and again, the word that was used was the ÔguiltÕ of this great matter], you must be very cautious.Ó Tozan remained dubious about what Ungon had said and later, as he was crossing the river, he saw his reflected image and experienced a great awakening to the meaning of the previous exchange, and he composed the following gatha.

ÒErnestly avoid seeking without, lest it recede far from you. Today I am walking alone, yet everywhere I meet him. He is now no other than myself, but I am now not him. It must be understood in this way in order to merge with suchness.Ó

And that happens a lot: usually a breakthrough will happen either in a sesshin or within a few days following a sesshin. ItÕs kind of interesting that thereÕs a kind of a lag in the samadhi that was going on in the sesshin and, after you kind of step back from it in a couple of days, thereÕs suddenly a clarity. And thatÕs what happened with Tozan. ÒErnestly avoid seeking without, lest it recede far from you. Today I am walking alone, yet everywhere I meet him [him: the teacher, the teachings, the Buddha, the lineage, all beings . . .]. He is now no other than myself, but I am now not him. Ó You and I are the same thing, yet I am not you and you are not me.

And thatÕs very difficult to grasp intellectually. It seems contradictory, just like form is emptiness/emptiness is form seems contradictory, just like all the dualities seem contradictory, because our minds are dualistic. ThatÕs the way they function: they separate things into this and that. And yet this and that are mutually arising; one canÕt exist without the other. They derive their meaning from each other: good needs bad in order to be good and bad needs good in order to be bad; up needs down; heaven needs earth; heads and tails are two parts of the same coin. You canÕt have one without the other. So, that mutual arising is also a mutual dependency, or interpenetration. And, in fact, that was the teachings of the Avokatamsa Sutra. When you begin to look at the universe in terms of that interpenetration of the dualities, and the mutual non-hindrance of the dualities Ñ that is, they function freely within each other, with no hindrance Ñ then you realize that all of the dualities function that way. All of the things that we have difficulties with; I mean, look at the dharma itself: whatÕs better, monkÕs practice, lay practice? Monk practice, lay practice interpenetrate; theyÕre mutually interdependent and mutually non-hindering. Monastery and the world, mundane and sacred, wholly and profane, good and bad, man and woman, up and down, in and out, all of these dualities mutually interpenetrate. They donÕt hinder each other when you really see how it works. But the problem is, is that we attach to one or the other. Either weÕre attached to the profane and the whole universe sucks or weÕre attached to the holy and everything is wonderful, nothingÕs wrong Ñ you know, the house is on fire and weÕre killing each other and polluting the earth and declaring war . . . well, thatÕs okay. So those two extremes, neither of them hold the truth any more than form holds the truth or emptiness holds the truth. The truth can be found in neither of those extremes. ThatÕs why so many koans deal with those dualities. They create, in the koan, the conflict of the duality. Like the question of the stick: what is it? If you call it a stick, you miss it, youÕre caught up in the words. If you say itÕs not a stick, you miss it, you deny itÕs existence. What is it?

So somewhere other than those two extremes is where the truth can be found. What is that truth?

When we go through the actual training itself, the beginning part of it deals with the dharmakaya Ñ the absolute, because we go into training completely taken with the phenomenal world. WeÕve spent a lifetime, up to the point that weÕve entered practice, learning how to take advantage of the phenomenal world. We get caught up in it and get completely tossed about by circumstances, completely at the mercy of circumstances, and after awhile a lot of pain, confusion happens. And we somehow say to ourselves, Ôthis doesnÕt seem right; there must be a way of doing this.Õ

And the fact is that IÕm constantly confronted with the fact that weÕre so incredibly lucky to have the opportunity to practice the dharma. And it may be that because a long period of time in my life, the dharma wasnÕt accessible. ItÕs only recently Ñ you walk into a little bookstore in Woodstock and you can find fifty books on Zen, to say nothing of Buddhism. Well, thirty-five years ago . . . one book, if you could find it. You had to go to New York Public Library to find it; no local library would ever have Sermons of a Buddhist Abbot, for example, by Soen Shaku. Or a little paragraph in the Encyclopaedia Britannica about Zen. I was teaching a course in the fifties on world religions and I was desperately looking for more information on Buddhism, particularly because what little I found sounded interesting.

And when I was facing the questions of life and saw that Science didnÕt have the answers to it Ñ I already rejected Christianity and Catholicism; I looked to Judaism and that didnÕt seem too much different than Christianity Ñ and I began looking at these other religions, Buddhism wasnÕt even there to look at. Philosophers didnÕt have the answers to my questions. So I came to the conclusion that nobody knows what the hell is going on. EverybodyÕs talking about it, but nobody really knows whatÕs going on. ItÕs like, you know, like being on an intercontinental flight and finding out thereÕs no pilot, itÕs on automatic pilot somehow.

And then one day, much later, in the fifties Ñ late fifties Ñ I discovered yes, indeed, people had figured this out. And it wasnÕt some modern figuring out; itÕs been around for 2,500 years. Thousands of people knew about it; thousands of people had experienced this enlightenment. And there were books written about it; there were people practicing it. And then in a short period of time, here it was in this country and finally available. And itÕs an extraordinary practice, particularly when you realize that there was a time not too long ago that it was totally unknown in this country, practically totally unknown.

So we start off with the dharmakaya, the absolute basis of reality. And once a student has a good grounding in that, we then again look at phenomenal existence and see how that absolute reality functions in the phenomenal world. But it doesnÕt end there. After looking at differentiation and the absolute basis of things, we then look at the words and the ideas that are used to describe reality, words and phrases. There are many koans that deal with that, and how that catches us up and confuses us. And then we look at koans that are particularly difficult to pass through. And then finally we look at the five ranks of Master Tozan, where the absolute and the relative are integrated.

We look at the absolute itself, we look at the relative within the absolute, we look at the absolute within the relative, and the mutual integration and non-hindrance of both. Only then are we able to appreciate the precepts. Because following that are 120 koans on the precepts to see if the student really, truly understands the moral and ethical teachings of their own accord. Not some rules passed down or some commandments that somebody gave us to follow, but their own life. And itÕs only at that point that the transmission occurs. ThatÕs been our tradition since the sixth ancestor, in China.

ÒDonÕt seek it from others or youÕll be a stranger from yourself. I now go on alone. Everywhere I encounter it. It now is me; I now am not it. One must understand it in this way to merge with being as it is.Ó As for the story of the teaching of the insentient, someone asked the teacher, ÒIÕve heard that you say the inanimates teach. I donÕt understand this and ask for your instruction.Ó The teacher said, ÒIf you would ask about the teaching of the inanimate, you should realize the inanimate. Only then will you be able to hear my teaching. Just ask after the teaching of the inanimate.Ó Fen/? said, ÒAt the moment IÕm just going by expedience for animate beings; what is the relationship of inanimate beings?Ó Again that duality: animate/inanimate; mundane/sacred. The teacher said, ÒAll present activities, as long as the twin currents of profane and holy do not appear and disappear; this, then, is mystic consciousness which is not in the realm of being or non-being, yet it is fully perceptive and aware. ItÕs just that it has no attachment to feelings.Ó

Now we have to be careful of the way some of these words are translated. Someone reading this thinks that Zen practitioners should walk around like robots. In fact, many of them do, many of us do walk around like robots or zombies, totally without feeling. ThatÕs not what it means, without attachment to feelings. Without attachment to feelings could also be interpreted no bondage of emotion. It doesnÕt mean no emotion; it doesnÕt mean not feeling or caring. It means no bondage; it means no attachment.

So how do you interpret no bondage to emotion? No bondage to emotion means when you cry, just cry. ItÕs neither being nor non-being. And thatÕs why the sixth patriarch said, ÒThe senses discerning objects is not consciousness.Ó ThatÕs why Master Wan-shi said, ÒThere is a wisdom apart from intellectual assessment and discrimination. There is a body which is not the four elements and the five clusters. In other words, it is this mystic consciousness. Always teaching clearly means itÕs always manifest. This is called teaching. It has one raise the eyebrows and blink the eyes. It makes one walk, stand, sit, recline, rushing, hurrying, dying here, being born there, eating when hungry, sleeping when tired, all this is teaching. Speaking, working, all activities are also teaching. ItÕs not just spoken or unspoken teaching, there is something which appears obviously and is clearly never hidden. Everything, down to the chirpping of insects, is all revealed; therefore, everything is always teaching, clearly, unceasingly. If you can discern minutely Ñ at that moment, you make yourself free. At that moment, you merge with Master Tozan, Bodhidharma, Buddha.

They had the same equipment that each of us has. ThereÕs nothing standing in our way of realizing that same freedom, other than the way we use our mind. ItÕs just a turn, like that. WeÕre habitually looking at things in terms of separation. We habitually separate ourselves from it. ThatÕs why itÕs important, in this sesshin, to be the barrier; because if you can be the barrier, sometimes just once you get the idea of it. ThatÕs what the breakthrough is, thatÕs what the glimpse is: be the pain for a second, a minute; be the koan; be the breath; body and mind fall away and you experience reality in a different way long enough to know that it does happen, that, indeed, itÕs possible to experience no eye, ear, nose, tongue, body and mind.

And when you come back from that, your way of seeing things is transformed, itÕs different. And even though you lose it again very quickly, youÕre able to return to it; and each time you return to it, it becomes stronger and stronger. And at first, itÕs almost like learning to walk all over again, because itÕs hard to deal with the world from that point of view, until you begin to see that the world functions according to that point of view, that itÕs not what you thought it was. And soon it becomes easy, and that non-hindrance, that interpenetration and non-hindrance of all things becomes part of your normal, spontaneous way of relating, of living.

ItÕs your heritage. ItÕs the heritage of all beings. It would be a shame, once having the opportunity, to go to our graves Ñ eventually Ñ not having realized it. So please, letÕs use the few days that remain of this sesshin. Take advantage of it every moment. Use this incredible zazen, gateway, to make ourselves free. When you liberate yourself, you liberate all sentient beings, you liberate all sentient and insentient beings. ThatÕs what it means to give life to the Buddha. So letÕs do it.

ABOUT THIS PUBLICATION

Buddhism is a great religion which enlightened humanity twenty-five centuries ago and released from all bondages, superstitious practices. It is a scientific religion. Gotama the Buddha is honoured today by every cultured and intellectual man irrespective of whatever religion he may profess, while the founders of most of the other religions are honoured only by their followers. Not only those who belong to some religions but also so-called free thinkers respect this world honoured Supreme Enlightened One. From the historical point of view there never lived any other Teacher who has ever given so much religious freedom as well as due credit to humanity. Before the advent of the Buddha, religion had been owned and monopolised only by a certain section of the society. The Buddha was the Teacher in history who indiscriminately opened the gate of religion to each and every man in society.

The Buddha has advised his followers to cultivate and develop the latent power of man and showed him how to make the best use of his will-power and intelligence without being a slave to an unknown being to find eternal happiness which He proclaimed to the world through His own experience but not through theories, mere beliefs and traditional practices. His teaching is such that any one can practise it without having any religious brand.

To compile this book I have selected various statements made by eminent philosophers, scholars, historians, scientists, writers, religious dignitaries, social reformers and politicians who are well known to the modern world as most intellectual people. Among them many are non-Buddhists and free thinkers. According to them, Buddhism is the most practical and rational religion which will appeal to scientific knowledge and which really can do a better service to mankind if the followers practise this religion properly.

It therefore gives me great pleasure to present these valuable quotations extracted from various books and articles. Whatever may be the opinion of those who have given Buddhism the topmost place in the religious field, the compiler by quoting them, does not mean to belittle other religious beliefs, for the idea of publishing this book is not to show the superiority of Buddhism over other religions but on the contrary to reflect the unbiased views expressed by various intellectuals.

All the captions to the statements in this book were given by the compiler.

THE BUDDHA

The Buddha's Greatness

I cannot myself feel that either in the matter of wisdom or in the matter of virtue Christ stands quite as high as some other people known to history - I think I should put Buddha above him in those respects.

-- Bertrand Russell, "Why I am not a Christian"

Embodiment of Virtues

Buddha was the embodiment of all the virtues he preached. During his successful and eventful ministry of 45 years he translated all his words into action; and in no place did he give vent to any human frailty, or any base passion. The Buddha's moral code is the most perfect which the world has ever known.

-- Prof. Max Muller, German Scholar

Blossom of the Human Tree

This is the blossom on our human tree Which opens in many a myriad years But opened, fills the world with wisdom's scent And love's dropped honey.

-- Sir Edwin Arnold, "Light of Asia"

Buddha is nearer to us

You see clearly a man, simple, devout, lonely, battling for light, a vivid human personality, not a myth. Beneath a mass of miraculous fable I feel that there also was a man. He too, gave a message to mankind universal in its character. Many of our best modern ideas are in closest harmony with it. All the miseries and discontents of life are due, he taught, to selfishness. Selfishness takes three forms - one, the desire to satisfy the senses; second, the craving for immortality; and the third the desire for prosperity and worldliness. Before a man can become serene he must cease to live for his senses or himself.

Then he merges into a great being. Buddha in a different language called men to self-forgetfulness five hundred years before Christ. In some ways he was near to us and our needs. Buddha was more lucid upon our individual importance in service than Christ, and less ambiguous upon the question of personal immortality.

-- H.G. Wells

Most Noble of Mankind

If you desire to see the most noble of mankind, look at the king in beggar's clothing; it is he whose sanctity is great among men.

-- Abdul Atahiya, A Muslim Poet

Buddha's Method

If any question has to be considered, it has to be considered peacefully and democratically in the way taught by the Buddha.

-- Nehru

A Lunatic and a Sane Man

The difference between the Buddha and an ordinary man is like the difference between a sane man and a lunatic.

-- A writer

Homage to Buddha

Lord Buddha could be very easily singled out as the one person known to man who received homage from the greatest number of mankind.

-- Prof. Saunders, Literary Secretory Y.M.C.A.
India, Burma, Ceylon

Buddha's Message

The Buddha has been something greater than all doctrine and dogma, and his eternal message has thrilled humanity through the ages. Perhaps at no time in past history was his message of peace more needed for a suffering and distracted humanity than it is today.

-- Nehru

Negative Answer of The Buddha

If we ask, for instance, whether the position of the electron remains the same, we must say 'no'; if we ask whether the electron's position changes with time, we must say 'no' ; if we ask whether it is in motion, we must say 'no'. The Buddha has given such answers when interrogated as to the conditions of a man's self after his death; but they are not familiar answers for the tradition of seventeenth and eighteenth century science.

-- J. Robert Oppenheimer

We are impressed by His spirit of reason

When we read Buddha's discourses, we are impressed by his spirit of reason. His ethical path has for its first step right views, a rational outlook. He endeavours to brush aside all cobwebs that interfere with mankind's vision of itself and its destiny.

-- Dr. S Radhakrishnan, "Gautama The Buddha"

Cool bead and loving heart

The most striking thing about the Buddha is almost a unique combination of a cool scientific head and profound sympathy of a warm and loving heart. The world today turns more and more towards the Buddha, for he alone represents the conscience of humanity.

-- Moni Bagghee, "Our Buddha"

Philosophic genius

The Buddha was a pioneer as a lover of men, and a philosophic genius rolled into a single vigorous and radiant personality. He had things to say that no man or woman, after 2500 years of bustling and hustling and chattering round the fountain of knowledge, can afford to ignore. Greater perhaps than his wisdom was the example he set.

-- Moni Bagghee, "Our Buddha"

He does not speak of sin

Serenity of spirit and love for all sentient creation are enjoined by the Buddha. He does not speak of sin, but only of ignorance and foolishness which could be cured by enlightenment and sympathy.

-- Dr. S Radhakrishnan, "Gautama The Buddha" .

Buddha is like a physician

The Buddha is like a physician. Just as a doctor must know the diagnosis of the different kinds of illness, their causes, the antidotes and remedies, and must be able to apply them, so also the Buddha has taught the Four Holy Truths which indicate the range of suffering, its origin, its cessation, and the way which lead to its cessation.

-- Dr. Edward Conze, "Buddhism"

Buddha is for whole mankind

The Buddha is not a property of Buddhists only. He is the property of whole mankind. His teaching is common to everybody. Every religion, which came into existence after the Buddha, has borrowed many good ideas from the Buddha.

-- A Muslim Scholar

A wise father

Buddha is one who sees his children playing in the consuming fire of worldliness and employs different expedients to bring them out of this burning house and lead them to the safe asylum of Nirvana.

-- Prof. Lakshimi Narasu, "The Essence of Buddhism"

Buddha is the way

I feel more and more that Sakyamuni is the nearest in character and effect to Him who is the Way, the Truth, and the Life.

-- Bishop Milman

A Radiant Sun

In this world of storm and strife, hatred and violence, the message of the Buddha shines like a radiant sun. Perhaps at no time was that message more needed than in the world of the atomic and hydrogen bombs. Two thousand five hundred years have only added to the vitality and truth of that message. Let us remember that immortal message and try to fashion our thoughts and actions in the light of that teaching. We may face with equanimity even the tenors of the atomic bomb age and help a little in promoting right thinking and right action.

-- Nehru

Greatest man ever born

Here is a teaching we can follow with confidence. Where in the world of religions, cults and creeds, can we find a master of such brilliance? In a pagent of stars he was a giant of the greatest magnitude. Little wonder that scientists, philosophers, and men of literature have proclaimed Him `the Greatest man ever born.' The radiance of this great teacher goes through a world of suffering and darkness, like a beacon light to guide and illuminate mankind.

-- A European Writer

BUDDHISM

Fundamental Teachings of The Buddha

Gentleness, serenity, compassion, through liberation from selfish-craving - these are the fundamental teachings of the great Oriental religion of Buddhism.

-- E. A. Burtt, "The Compassionate Buddha"

Well Built Bridge

Buddha Dharma is like a bridge well built of flexible steel, it gives a little to wind and water, it adapts itself to changing circumstances, but at the same time it has secured foundations and offers a safe way to the Deathless, to Nirvana.

-- Phra K Khantipalo, "Tolerance"

To Awake the Human Heart

Surely the mysterious East, that fertile mother of religions, has given us in Buddhism a true revelation, since it makes known to us the moral beauty and purity that lies in the deep of human nature needing no other divinity than that which abides in the human heart to awake them into living glory.

-- Charles T. Gorham

Nothing to surpass Buddhism

Buddhist or not Buddhist, I have examined every one of the great religious systems of the world, and in none of them have I found anything to surpass, in beauty and comprehensiveness, the Noble Eightfold Path and the Four Noble Truths of the Buddha. I am content to shape my life according to that path.

-- Prof. Rhys Davids

Buddhism does not lead us to a Fool's Paradise

Buddhism is realistic, for it takes a realistic view of life and of the world. It does not falsely pull us into living in a fool's paradise, nor does it frighten and agonize us with all kinds of imaginary fears and guilt-feelings. It calls us exactly and objectively what we are and what the world around us is, and shows us the way to perfect freedom, peace, tranquility and happiness.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula

The Buddha's Mission

The mission of the Buddha was quite unique in its character, and therefore it stands quite apart from the many other religions of the world. His mission was to bring the birds of idealism flying in the air nearer to the earth, because the food for their bodies belonged to the earth.

-- Hazrat Inayat Khan. "The Sufi Message"

A cosmic religion

The religion of the future will be a cosmic religion. It should transcend a personal God and avoid dogmas and theology. Covering both the natural and the spiritual, it should be based on a religious sense arising from the experience of all . things, natural and spiritual, as a meaningful unity. Buddhism answers this description.

-- Albert Einstein

Buddhism will remain unaffected

The doctrines of Buddha Dhamma stand today, as unaffected by the march of time and the expansion of knowledge as when they were first enunciated. No matter to what lengths increased scientific knowledge can extend man's mental horizon, within the framework of the Dhamma there is room for the acceptance and assimilation of further discovery. It does not rely for its appeal upon limited concepts of primitive minds nor for its power upon the negation of thought.

-- Francis Story, "Buddhism as World Religion"

Joyful religion

Buddhism is quite opposed to the melancholic, sorrowful, penitent and gloomy attitude of mind which is considered a hindrance to the realisation of Truth. On the other hand, it is interesting to remember here that joy is one of the seven 'Factors of Illumination', the essential qualities to be cultivated for the realisation of Nirvana.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula, 'What the Buddha Taught'

Challenge to other religions

It is Buddhism as we find it actually recorded, not a hypothetical primitive system, which still forms a challenge to other religions.

-- Bishop Gore, "Buddha and the Christ."

No assumption in Buddhism

It is a glory of Buddhism that it makes intellectual enlightenment an essential condition of salvation. In Buddhism morality and intellectual enlightenment are inseparable from one another. While morality forms the basis of the highest life, knowledge and wisdom complete it. Without a perfect understanding of the law of causality and transformation (Pratityasamutpada), no one can even be said to be truly moral if he does not possess the necessary insight and knowledge. In this respect Buddhism differs from all other religions. All monotheistic religions start with certain assumptions, and when these assumptions are contradicted by the growth of knowledge it increase sorrow. But Buddhism starts with no assumptions. It stands on the firm rock of facts, and can therefore never shun the dry light of knowledge.

-- Prof. Lakshimi Narasu, "The Essence of Buddhism"

Buddha has seen deeper than modern idealists

Gautama got rid of even that shade of a shadow of permanent existence by a metaphysical tour de force of great interest to the student of philosophy, seeing that it supplies the wanting half of Bishop Berkeley's well-known idealist argument. It is a remarkable indication of the subtlety of Indian speculation that Gautama should have seen deeper than the greatest of modern idealists. The tendency of enlightened thought of all today all the world over is not towards theology, but philosophy and psychology. The bark of theological dualism is drifting into danger. The fundamental principles of evolution and monism are being accepted by the thoughtful.

-- Prof. Huxley. "Evolution And Ethics"

Religious Revolution

Twenty-five centuries ago India witnessed an intellectual and religious revolution which culminated in the overthrow of monotheism, priestly selfishness, and the establishment of a synthetic religion, a system of light and thought which was appropriately called Dhamma - Philosophical Religion.

-- Anagarika Dharmapala, "The World's Debt to Buddha"

A Plan for Living

Buddhism is a plan for living in such a way as to derive highest benefit from life. It is a religion of wisdom where knowledge and intelligence predominate. The Buddha did not preach to win converts but to enlighten listeners.

-- A Western writer

Come and See

Buddhism is always a question of knowing and seeing, and not that of believing. The teaching of the Buddha is qualified as Ehi-Passiko, inviting you to come and see, but not to come and believe.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula, "What the Buddha Taught"

Religion of Man

Buddhism will last as long as the sun and moon last and the human race exists upon the earth, for it is the religion of man, of humanity as a whole.

-- Bandaranaike, Former Prime Minister of Sri Lanka

Buddhist is not a slave to anybody

A Buddhist is not a slave to a book or to any person. Nor does he sacrifice his freedom of thought by becoming a follower of the Buddha. He can exercise his own free will and develop his knowledge even to the extent of attaining Buddhahood himself, for all are potential Buddhas.

-- Ven. Narada Maha Thera "What is Buddhism"

Life by principle

Buddhism taught a life not by rule, but by principle, a life of beauty; and as a consequence, it was a religion of tolerance. It was the most charitable system under the sun.

-- Rev. Joseph Wain

Buddhism would remain

Buddhism would remain what it is even if it were proved that the Buddha never lived.

-- Christmas Humphreys, "Buddhism"

Modern Problems

To read a little Buddhism is to realize that the Buddhists knew, two thousand five hundred years ago, far more about our modern problems of psychology than they have yet been given credit for. They studied these problems long ago and found their answers too.

-- Dr. Graham Howe

Mind Training

We hear much nowadays of thought-power, but Buddhism is the most complete and effective system of mind-training yet placed before the world.

-- Dudley Wright

New Race

The Buddha created a new race of men, a race of moral heroes, a race of salvation-workers, a race of Buddhas.

-- Manmatha Nath Sastri

First Missionary

Buddhism is the first missionary religion in the history of humanity with a universal message of salvation for all mankind. The Buddha after his Enlightenment sent out sixty-one disciples in different directions asking them to preach the doctrine for the weal and welfare of mankind.

-- Dr. K.N. Jayatilleke, "Buddhism and Peace"

No forced conversion

It was never, however, the Buddhist way to proselytise - in the sense of forcing ideas and beliefs upon an unwilling audience, much less to exert pressure of any kind, or any kind of flattery, deceit or cajolery, to win adherence to one's own point of view. Buddhist missionaries have never competed for converts in the marketplace.

-- Dr. G.P. Malalasekara

Ultimate fact of reality

Here it is necessary to draw attention to another unique feature of the religion of the Buddha, namely, that it is the only religion of any religious teacher, which is the outcome of a consistent philosophy, which claims to tell us about the ultimate facts of existence and reality. The religion of the Buddha is a way of life resulting from the acceptance of a view of life, which is said to be factual. His philosophy is not without an account of the nature of knowledge.

-- Dr. K.N. Jayatilleke, "Buddhism and Peace"

No fanaticism

Of Buddhism alone can it be affirmed it is free from all fanaticism. Its aim being to produce in every man a thorough internal transforming by self-conquest, how can it have recourse to might or money or even persuasion for effecting conversion? The Buddha has only shown the way to salvation, and it is left to each individual to decide for himself if he would follow it.

-- Prof. Lakshimi Narasu, "The Essence of Buddhism"

Buddhism and other faiths

Buddhism is like the palm of the hand, the other religions being the fingers.

-- The great Khan Mongka

Buddhism is not a melancholy religion

Some people think that Buddhism is a dark and melancholy religion. It is not so; it will make its followers bright and cheerful. When we read the birth stories of Bodhisattva, the future Buddha we learn how He cultivated the Perfection of patience and forbearance. It will help us to be cheerful even in the midst of great troubles and to take delight in others' welfare.

-- Ven. Gnanatitoka, A German Buddhist Scholar

Buddhism and social welfare

Those who think that Buddhism is interested only in lofty ideals, high moral and philosophical thought, and ignores any social and economic welfare of people, are wrong. The Buddha was interested in the happiness of men. To him happiness was not possible without leading a pure life based on moral and spiritual principles. But he knew that leading such a life was hard in unfavourable material and social conditions.

Buddhism does not consider material welfare as an end in itself; it is only a means to an end - a higher and nobler end. But it is a means which is indispensable, indispensable in achieving a higher purpose for man's happiness. So Buddhism recognizes the need of certain minimum material conditions favourable to spiritual success - even that of a monk engaged in meditation in some solitary place.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula, "What the Buddha Taught"

Example from Asoka

Turn to Buddhism, and you will read that Asoka not only preached a lofty morality but exercised the power of kingship in a manner that shames our modern sovereigns of other faiths.

-- Geoffrey Mortimer, A Writer in the West

Fixed Principles

It will not be possible even today in regard to Buddhism that it is worn out because it is rooted upon certain fixed principles that can never be altered.

-- Gertrude Garatt

Dhamma is the Law

All the teachings of the Buddha can be summed up in one word: "Dhamma". This law of righteousness, exists not only in a man's heart but it exists in the universe also. All the universe is an embodiment or revelation of Dhamma. The laws of nature which modern science have discovered are revelations of Dhamma.

If the Moon rises and sets, it is because of Dhamma, for Dhamma is that law residing in the universe that makes matter act in the ways studied in physics, chemistry, zoology, botany and astronomy. Dhamma exists in the universe just as Dhamma exists in the heart of man. If man will live by Dhamma, he will escape misery and attain Nibbana.

-- Ven. A. Mahinda

Persecution

Of the great religions of history I prefer Buddhism, especially in its earliest forms, because it has had the smallest element of persecution.

-- Bertrand Russell

Appreciation of Buddhism

Although one may originally be attracted by its remoteness, one can appreciate the real value of Buddhism only when one judges it by the result it produces in one's own life from day to day.

-- Dr. Edward Conze, A Western Buddhist Scholar

Knowledge is the key to higher path

Without sensuous pleasure would life be endurable? Without belief in immortality can man be moral? Without worship of a God can man advance towards righteousness? Yes, replies the Buddha, these ends can be attained by knowledge; knowledge alone is the key to the higher path, the one worth pursuing in life; knowledge is that which brings calmness and peace to life, which renders man indifferent to the storms of the phenomenal world.

-- Prof. Karl Pearson

Fortunate Buddhist

How fortunate are the humble followers of the Buddha who have not inherited the fallacy of infallibility of any revealed book from the very beginning.

-- Ven. Prof. Ananda Kaushalyayana

Buddhism and Rites

Buddhism is thus a personal religion, and there is little room in it for ritual and ceremony. An act done with an idea of one's own conditioning ceases to be a rite. Much of the seemingly ritual of present-day Buddhism, when seen thus are really not rites.

-- Dr. W.F. Jayasuriya
"The Psychology and Philosophy of Buddhism"

Saviour

If the Buddha is to be called a 'saviour' at all, it is only in the sense that he discovered and showed the Path to Liberation, Nirvana. But we must tread the Path ourselves.

-- Ven. Dr W. Rahula, "What the Buddha Taught"

No force

To force oneself to believe and to accept a thing without understanding is political, and not spiritual or intellectual.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula, "What the Buddha Taught"

Respect other religions

One should not honour only one's own religion and condemn the religions of others, but one should honour others' religions for this or that reason. So doing, one helps one's own religion to grow and renders service to the religions of others too. In acting otherwise one digs the grave of one's own religion and also does harm to other religions. Whosoever honours his own religion and condemns other religions, does so indeed through devotion to his own religion, thinking "I will glorify my own religion". But on the contrary, in so doing he injures his own religion more gravely. So concord is good: Let all listen, and be willing to listen to the doctrines professed by others.

-- Emperor Asoka

A genuine pride

A religion or a way of life is judged not merely by the truths it proclaims but also by the change that it brings about in the life of its followers. So far as this test is concerned Buddhism has a record of achievements in which we can take a genuine pride.

-- D. Valisinha, General Secretary, Maha Bodhi Society, "Buddhist way of life"

Unconsciousness

It can also be said that India discovered the unconsciousness earlier than the Western psychologists. For them the unconscious consists in the totality of the impressions which slumber in the individual as the inheritance from his previous existence. The Buddhist technique of meditation, which is concerned with the latent forces, is thus a fore-runner of modern psychoanalysis, of autogenic mental training etc.

-- Prof. Von Glasenapp, A German Scholar

Rational analysis

Buddhism is the only great religion of the world that is consciously and frankly based on a systematic rational analysis of the problems of life and of the way to its solution.

-- Moni Bagghee, "Our Buddha"

Enemy of religion

There is little of what we call dogma in the Buddha's teaching. With a breadth of view rare in that age and not common in ours he refuses to stifle criticism. Intolerance seemed to him the greatest enemy of religion.

-- Dr. S. Radhakrishnan, "Gautama The Buddha"

Sectarianism

Most neophytes of some other religions are controlled by their Guru and are forbidden to read the scriptures, doctrines, magazines, booklets and tracts of other religions. This very rarely happens within Buddhism.

-- Phra Khantipalo, "Tolerance"

The Five precepts

These five precepts, indicate five arterial directions in which the Buddhist self-control is to be exercised. Thus, the first rule calls upon him to control the passion of anger, the second, the desire for material possessions, the third, the lust of the flesh, the fourth, cowardice and malevolence (the causes of untruthfulness), the fifth, the craving for unwholesome excitement.

-- Edmond Holmes, "The creed of Buddha"

Man who achieved a great victory

One of the first scholars to begin the work of translating the Pali Literature into English, was the son of a well-known clergyman. His object in undertaking the work was to prove the superiority of Christianity Over Buddhism. He failed in this task but he achieved a greater victory than he expected. He became a Buddhist. We must never forget the happy chance which prompted him to undertake this work and thereby make the precious Dhamma available to thousands in the West. The name of this great scholar was Dr. Rhys Davids.

-- Ven. A. Mahinda, "Blue Print of happiness"

Human destiny

Over great areas of the world it still survives. It is possible that in contact with Western science, and inspired by the spirit of history, the original teaching of Gotama, revived and purified, may yet play a large part in the direction of human destiny.

-- H.G. Wells

Parliamentary system borrowed from Buddhism

It is probable that the tendency towards self-government evidenced by these various forms of corporate activity received fresh impetus from the Buddhist rejection of the authority of the priesthood and further but its doctrine of equality as exemplified by its repudiation of caste. It is indeed to the Buddhist books that we have to turn for an account of the manner in which the affairs of the early examples of representative self-governing institutions were conducted. It may come as a surprise to many to learn that in the assemblies of Buddhists in India 2500 years and more ago are to be found the rudiments of our own parliamentary practice of the present day.

The dignity of the assembly was preserved by the appointment of a special officer - the embryo of "Mr. Speaker" in our house of commons. A second officer was appointed to see that when necessary a quorum was secured - the prototype of the Parliamentary Chief Whip, in our own system. A member initiating business did so in the form of a motion which was then open to discussion. In some cases, this was done once only, in others three times, thus anticipating the practice of Parliament in requiring that a bill be read a third time before it becomes law. If discussion disclosed a difference of opinion the matter was decided by the vote of the majority, the voting being by ballot.

-- Marquess of Zetland, a former Viceroy of India,
"Legacy of India "

Democracy

Buddhism was a democratic movement, which upheld democracy in religion, democracy in society, and democracy in politics.

-- Dr Ambedkar

Ethical man of genius

In this sphere He gave expression to truths of everlasting value and advanced the ethics not of India alone but of humanity. Buddha was one of the greatest ethical men of genius ever bestowed upon the world.

-- Albert Schweitzer, a leading Western philosopher

World culture

Buddhism has done more for the advance of world civilization and true culture than any other influence in the chronicles of mankind.

-- H. G. Wells

TOLERANCE-PEACE-LOVE

To win peace

The question that inevitably suggests itself is, how far can the great message of the Buddha apply to the present-day world? Perhaps it may apply, perhaps it may not; but if we follow the principles enunciated by the Buddha, we will ultimately win peace and tranquility for the world.

-- Nehru

Wisdom is the sword and ignorance is the enemy

Not a single page of Buddhist history has ever been lurid with the light of inquisitorial fires, or darkened with the smoke of heretic or heathen cities ablaze, or red with blood of the guiltless victims of religious hatred. Buddhism wields only one sword, the sword of Wisdom, and recognizes only one enemy - ignorance. This is the testimony of history, and is not to be gain-said.

-- Prof. Bapat "2500 years of Buddhism"

No unkind word

There was never an occasion when the Buddha flamed forth in anger, never an incident when an unkind word escaped his lips.

-- Dr. S. Radhakrishnan

Practise of wisdom and compassion

It seemed that the kindly ascetic, eternally young, seated cross-legged on the lotus of purity with his right hand raised in admonition, answered in these two words: "If you wish to escape from suffering and from fear, practise wisdom and compassion."

-- Anatole France

No Persecution

There is no record known to me in the whole of the long history of Buddhism throughout the many centuries where its followers have been for such lengthened periods supreme, of any persecution by the Buddhists of the followers of any other faith.

-- Prof. Rhys Davids

MAN'S POSITION IN BUDDHISM

Man gives law to nature

Law in the scientific sense is essentially a product of the human mind and has no meaning apart from man. There is more meaning in the statement that man gives law to nature than in its converse that nature gives laws to man.

-- Prof. Karl Pearson

Man is not ready made

Man today is the result of millions of repetitions of thoughts and acts. He is not ready made; he becomes, and is still becoming. His character is predetermined by his own choice, the thought, the act, which he chooses, that by habit, he becomes.

-- Ven. Piyadassi

Man can stand on his own feet

Buddhism makes man stand on his own feet and rouses self-confidence and energy.

-- Ven. Narada Thera, "Buddhism in a nutshell"

Man can cease to be crushed

Man is greater than the blind forces of nature because even though he is crushed by them he remains superior by virtue of his understanding of them. Again, Buddhism carries the truth further: it shows that by means of understanding man can also control his circumstances. He can cease to be crushed by them, and use their laws to raise himself.

-- Pascal

Belief in soul is the cause of all the trouble

Buddhism stands unique in the history of human thought in denying the existence of such a Soul, Self, or Atman. According to the teaching of the Buddha, the idea of self is an imaginary, false belief which has no corresponding reality, and it produces harmful thoughts of 'me' and 'mine', selfish desire, craving, attachment, hatred, ill-will, conceit, pride, egoism, and other defilements, impurities and problems. It is the source of all the troubles in the world from personal conflicts to wars between nations. In short, to this false view can be traced all the evils in the world.

-- Ven. Dr. W. Rahula, "What the Buddha Taught "

Life after death is not a mystery

The difference between death and birth is only a thought-moment: the last thought-moment in the so-called next life, which in fact is the continuity of the same series. During this life itself, too, one thought-moment conditions the next thought-moment. So, from the Buddhist point of view, the question of life after death is not a great mystery, and a Buddhist is never worried about this problem.

Buddhism and Modern Science

'I have often said, and I shall say again and again, that between Buddhism and modern Science there exists a close intellectual bond.'

-- Sir Edwin Arnold

Buddhism copes with Science

If there is any religion that would cope with modern scientific needs it would be Buddhism.

-- Albert Einstein

A Spiritual Science

Buddhism is, on the contrary, a system of thought, a religion, a spiritual science and a way of life, which is reasonable, practical and all-embracing. For 2500 years it has satisfied the spiritual needs of nearly one-third of mankind. It appeals to the West, insists on self-reliance coupled with tolerance for the other's points of view, embraces science, religion, philosophy, psychology, ethics and art, and points to man alone as the creator of his present life and sole designer of his destiny.

-- Christmas Humphreys

Buddhism begins where science ends

Science can give no assurance herein. But Buddhism can meet the Atomic Challenge, because the supramundane knowledge of Buddhism begins where science leaves off. And this is clear enough to anyone who has made a study of Buddhism. For, through Buddhist Meditation, the atomic constituents making up matter have been seen and felt, and the sorrow, or unsatisfactoriness (or Dukkha), of their 'arising and passing away' (dependent on causes) has made itself with what we call a `soul' or 'atma' - the illusion of Sakkayaditthi, as it is called in the Buddha's teaching.

-- Egerton C. Baptist, "Supreme Science of the Buddha"

Cause and Effect instead of rewards and punishments

According to the Buddha the world is not so constituted. Buddhists believe in a just rational of Kamma that operates automatically and speak in terms of cause and effect instead of rewards and punishments.

-- A writer

WHAT IS NIBBANA

Salvation without God

For the first time in the history of the world, Buddha proclaimed a salvation, which each man could gain for himself and by himself in this world during this life, without the least help from a personal God or gods. He strongly inculcated the doctrine of self-reliance, of purity, of courtesy, of enlightenment, of peace and of universal love. He strongly urged the necessity of knowledge, for without wisdom psychic insight could not be got in his life.

-- Prof. Eliot, "Buddhism and Hinduism"

Buddha and the salvation

It is not the Buddha who delivers men, but he teaches them to deliver themselves, even as he has delivered himself. They accept his teaching of the truth, not because it comes from him, but, because of personal conviction, aroused by his words, arises by the light of their own spirit.

-- Dr. Oldenburg, A German Buddhist scholar

Buddha does not demand belief

The Buddha has not merely awakened to the supreme reality: he also presents his higher knowledge that is superior to that of "all gods and men" most clearly and free from all mythological disguise and mythical clothing. Here, however, it is given in so cogent a form that it presents itself as positively and self-evident to the person who is able to follow him. For this reason the Buddha does not demand any belief, but promises knowledge.

-- George Grimm, "The doctrine of the Buddha"

BUDDHISM AND OTHER RELIGIONS

Post-Buddhistic Hinduism

The various ways in which Buddhism influenced, modified, transformed and revitalised Hindu religion among all the philosophical Sutras of the Hindus, are admittedly post-Buddhistic. The presupposition of Indian philosophy in the doctrine of Karma and rebirth and other pre-Buddhistic system have attained fullest development from Buddhistic literature and been established on philosophical basis.

-- Dr. S. N. Dasgupta

Universal Ethics

None of the pre-Buddhistic religions of India may be said to have been able to formulate a code of ethics and religion that was universally and compulsorily valid for all.

-- Dr. S.N. Dasgupta

Buddhism is Buddhism

Buddhism and Jainism were certainly not Hinduism or even the Vedic Dharma. Yet they arose in India and were integral parts of Indian life, culture and philosophy. Buddhist or Jaina in India is a hundred per cent product of Indian thought and culture, yet neither is a Hindu by faith. It is entirely misleading to refer to Indian culture as Hindu culture.

-- Nehru, "Discovery of India"

Eternal Debt to the Buddha

It is my deliberate opinion that the essential part of the teachings of the Buddha now forms an integral part of Hinduism. It is impossible for Hindu India today to retrace her steps and go behind the great reformation that Gautama effected in Hinduism. By his immense sacrifice, by his great renunciation, and by the immaculate purity of his life he left an indelible impression upon Hinduism, and Hinduism owes an eternal debt of gratitude to that great teacher.

-- Mahatma Gandhi, "Maha Bodhi"

Dominant creed

A system which knows no God in the Western sense, which denies a soul to man, which counts the belief in immortality a blunder, which refuses any efficacy to prayer and sacrifice, which bides men to look to nothing but their own efforts for salvation, which in its original purity knew nothing of vows of obedience and never sought the aid of the secular arm, yet spread over a considerable motley of the old world with marvellous rapidity and is still, which whatever base admixture of forcing superstitions, the dominant creed of a large fraction of mankind.

-- T.H. Huxley

Buddhist Idea of sin

Its idea of sin differs somewhat from the Christian idea. Sin to the Buddhist is mere ignorance or stupidity. The wicked man is an ignorant man. He doesn't need punishment and condemnation so much as he needs instruction. He is not regarded as 'violating God's commands' or as one who must beg for divine mercy and forgiveness. Rather it is necessary for the sinner's friends to make him reason in the human way. The Buddhist does not believe the sinner can escape the consequences in prayerful attempts to bargain with God.

-- John Walters. "Mind unshaken"

Gods need salvation

For the first time in human history the Buddha admonished, entreated and appealed to people not to hurt a living being, not to offer prayer or praise or sacrifice to gods. With all the eloquence at his command the exalted one vehemently proclaimed that gods are also in dire need of salvation themselves.

-- Prof. Rhys Davids

THE WORLD AND THE UNIVERSE

Unsatisfactory world

Buddha was not angry with the world. He thought of it as unsatisfactory and transitory rather than wicked, as ignorant rather than rebellious. He troubled little about people who would not listen to him and showed no nervous irritability.

-- Prof. Eliot, "Buddhism and Hinduism"

A great battle

The whole universe is a vast field of battle. Everywhere there is fighting. Existence is nothing but a vain struggle against germs of dreadful diseases, molecules against molecules, atoms against atoms, and electrons against electrons. Mind is still more a scene of battle. Forms, sounds, tastes etc. are resultants of counteracting and belligerent forces. The very existence of war proves that there is a state of Perfect Peace.

It is what we call Nibbana.

HOW LONG DOES IT TAKE TO GO NOWHERE?

ZEN IN AMERICAN POP CULTURE -- a perspective from Stephen Echard Musgrave Roshi, Zen Master with the Zen Institute of San Diego.

Echard Musgrave Roshi is a Zen Master in the Soto tradition of Japan, the largest Zen tradition in the world. He received transmission and the title Roshi in 1988 from Reverend Doctor Soyu Matsuoka, bishop of the Soto tradition, one of Japan's most respected Zen masters and patriarch of American Zen. Roshi Echard has been a Zen student for twenty-eight years and has studied under masters of the Rinzai, Korean, Vietnamese and Chinese traditions. In the following interview, Roshi Echard clarifies some of the issues surrounding the stereotypes of Zen in American pop culture. This interview was conducted by Linnea Lamar.

Lamar: When I hear the words "emptiness" or "nothingness," I get the impression that Zen is antithetical to a "belief in something" that characterizes much religious thought. Even within the Zen tradition, to say that one believes in emptiness seems like a contradiction in logic.

Echard: In Zen, emptiness is a translation of the Sanskrit term "shunyata" or "voidness," but that does not imply vacuity. When we talk about "emptiness" or "nothingness" in Zen, that term really comes from the fact that the essence of Zen is Buddhism, which is grounded in the doctrine of interdependent origination. That is to say that all phenomenon exists in conjunction with all other phenomenon. Consequently, when you try to look at something's ontological structure, that is when you try to define it as an absolute thing in and of itself, it is "empty" in that what you're seeing is merely the result of your own sensual limitations or epistemological processes. It's not a matter of the thing's real being; it's a matter of the way you perceive it. So, in that respect, we use the term "emptiness" because nothing has a real validity solely in and of itself, but it is entirely relational.

That a thing's reality is relational, however, does not mean that things are not significant in and of themselves. Things are expressions of reality; they are the manifestations of reality as "thing," just as trees are the expression of the forest. The forest in turn is not manifested where there are no trees. Trouble lies in an absolute identification with either the forest or its expression as trees.

Lamar: It seems as though in American pop culture, this emptiness is often misconstrued as the absence of clear-cut moral principles associated with other religions.

Echard: The misconception concerning morality comes when you take this idea of emptiness and therefore decide, "Since nothing has an individual or separate being, all things must therefore have no value." People with this sort of attitude mistakenly try to circumvent real moral principles.

Lamar: Do you attribute this mistake to a superficial understanding of Zen, one that intrigues the intellect, but does not bring the teachings into actual practice?

Echard: First of all, you notice that Western popularizers of Zen hardly ever mention "Buddhism" in the same breath with "Zen." That's because in the popular culture there's the notion that you can somehow extrapolate the essence of Zen from Zen Buddhism and have something that's meaningful.

In a way, it's sort of a homeopathic understanding of spiritual practice: Such people think that you can extract the essence out of Zen Buddhism, dilute it to infinitesimal levels, and still possess the same thing. I'm not saying that doesn't work in regards to homeopathic medicine, but it doesn't work in regards to spiritual practice.

Lamar: Would you say that an intellectual understanding, such as that gained from reading scholarly books on the subject, has any value for people who sincerely wish to understand Zen?

Echard: Of course, an intellectual understanding is necessary. After all, the word "Zen" means meditation and is the eighth path of the Eightfold Path which includes right views, right action, right effort, right speech, and so on. But unless you are involved in actively integrating all of these factors together into your spiritual life, intellectual understanding simply will not suffice to bring about any meaningful self-transformation, which of course is the intent of Zen Buddhism. Reading scholarly books on the subject without making an attempt to fully integrate your practice into the entirety of your life is like the alcoholic who goes to an A.A. meeting in the morning and a cocktail lounge in the afternoon!

Lamar: But still, even if we hope to apply the precepts of Buddhism in any real way, it is necessary to remove our sense of self and all accompanying delusions. Therefore, as this process unfolds, are we losing something or gaining it?

Echard: Yes, basically most people thing of spiritual growth as gaining wisdom or adding something. But actually it's the other way around: It's getting rid of ignorance. In Buddhism there is the inherent belief that wisdom or truth is the constituent part of our nature and that ignorance is clouding it over. And so what we are trying to do is to get rid of ignorant views. As ignorant views disappear and we live a life that is more authentic and real, then we become wise and suffering seems to disappear. So it's not an additive process; it's a subtractive process.

Lamar: What role does meditation play in this process?

Echard: Meditation or "zazen," which we call sitting meditation, involves calming the mind, not by forceful effort but by simply seeing the kinds of thoughts and emotions which we possess and which possess us in a very real sense due to our identification with them. Therefore, when thoughts and emotions arise from the stream of consciousness, we will need to disassociate from them, without repressing. This same practice then carries over into our daily lives, and we begin to see the thoughts for just what they are -- usually something learned or experienced in the past. These have become identified with certain emotions and eventually with ourselves.

Lamar: It seems that many non-Buddhist Zen pop-culture organizations advocate the practice of meditation, also. What is the difference between these forms of meditation and that of zazen?

Echard: Most meditations are directed towards enhancing one's life in some way, and there's nothing wrong with that. The premise of most of these pop meditations, however, is that one can develop some kind of psychological attitude that defends oneself against reality. In Zen Buddhism, meditation is not directed towards defending oneself against the stresses of reality but rather towards confronting reality as it is and becoming one with it. This requires a world view and a way of being in the world that reinforces it.

In this way, the practice of meditation is contained within a meaningful context. The context of many New Age groups stays in flux. Or sometimes a disgruntled Zen student, due to a failure to resolve a dysfunctional relationship with their teacher, will want to trash the tradition with the teacher, thus taking the meditation out of context or inventing his or her own context. This is inviting a dangerous alchemy. Practicing Zen meditation without the context of the Eightfold Path would be like carrying water in a leaky bucket.

Lamar: "Enlightenment" seems to be a big word in Zen circles. Is this a definitive experience or merely another phase of the spiritual-transformation process?

Echard: Several books written by Western authors emphasize "satori" or "kensho," a kind of peak experience arising out of meditation in which we intensely experience the reality or ground of our being. But ENLIGHTENMENT IS REALLY A WAY OF BEING IN THE WORLD WHICH CORRESPONDS WITH THE GROUND OF OUR BEING AND THEREFOI IS AN EXPRESSION OF IT. As such, the goal of spiritual practice should be intrinsic to itself -- like any practice which has meaning. That is to say, when we practice zazen, we should be just practicing without any idea about what we're going to gain or not gain.

Lamar: Do special experiences such as "satori" serve any purpose?

Echard: Special experiences are fine; they are expressions of our practice, just like the periods of suffering that result from our ignorance. And if we use "satori" as a springboard to throw us into our practice and particularly if we use it as a springboard for compassion, that is, if we want to share this deep feeling of freedom and joy with other beings, then it's positive.

But if we allow it to insulate ourselves, and we try to get stuck in the moment, then we end up being a kind of Zen psychopath, and there's more than a few of those running around, some of which are "roshis," as a matter of fact.

Lamar: Sometimes I see short courses to a state of enlightenment offered, ranging from six weeks to two years. I really wonder how effective they can possibly be.

Echard: (Laughing) I love some of these things, too. I think my favorite was an ad in one of these New Age magazines which said, "Achieve in twenty minutes what it takes a Zen priest to achieve in twenty years." The only thing I know of that's consistent with Zen priests after twenty years is hemorrhoids. Since this thing attached to the head, it definitely was a mystical operation.

It would be wonderful if reality could be divided up into little sound bytes, but it doesn't work that way. When you're finished with your two week's short course and you have to go back into the big bad world, you feel calm and peaceful for the first forty minutes on the way home. And then somebody runs you off the road, and you've lost your entire practice. That's usually the way it works.

Lamar: How does a student of Zen recognize the enlightenment stage?

Echard: (Laughing) Well, you have to be like a Hollywood vampire. That is, when you look in the mirror, you can't see yourself. Instead, enlightenment is like two mirrors facing one another with all things reflected within them. Both mirrors are of the same substance, and there is nothing in either of them that is independent of their mutual reality.

When the mirror becomes perfectly clean, when you no longer feel a tension with the world, when your heart is so full of wisdom and compassion that little or nothing disturbs it, then you can say that you are abiding, at least for that time, in enlightenment.

Lamar: How long does this process take?

Echard: The deeper and the more you practice, the more you realize that parts of your being still require work, so you just practice. That's all. Spiritual practice is something that has no final goal, so there's no end to it. How long does it take to go nowhere? Forever, or you're already there.

Introduction

The philosophy of Buddhism is contained in the Four Noble Truths. [1]

The //truth of suffering// reveals that all forms of becoming, all the various elements of existence comprised in the "five aggregates" or groups of existence -- also called the "five categories which are the objects of clinging" (//panc'upadana-kkhandha//) -- are inseparable from suffering as long as they remain objects of grasping or clinging. All corporeality, all feelings and sensations, all perceptions, all mental formations and consciousness, being impermanent, are a source of suffering, are conditioned phenomena and hence not-self (//anicca, dukkha, anatta//). Ceaseless origination and dissolution best characterize the process of existence called life, for all elements of this flux of becoming continually arise from conditions created by us and then pass away, giving rise to new elements of being according to one's actions or kamma.

All suffering originates from craving, and our very existence is conditioned by craving, which is threefold: the craving for sense pleasures (//kama-tanha//), craving for continued and renewed existence (//bhava-tanha//), and craving for annihilation after death (//vibhava-tanha//). This is the //truth of the origin of suffering//.

The attainment of perfect happiness, the breaking of the chain of rebirths and suffering through the realization of Nibbana, is possible only through the utter extirpation of that threefold craving. This is the //truth of suffering's cessation//.

(//panna//). This is the //truth of the way that leads to the cessation of suffering//.

The prevalence of suffering and absence of freedom and happiness is due to man's subjection to the three roots of all unskill and evil, and all unwholesome actions (//akusalakamma//), viz. lust, hatred and delusion (//lobha, dosa, moha//).

Virtuous conduct casts out lust. The calm of true concentration and mental culture conquers hatred. Wisdom or right understanding, also called direct knowledge resulting from meditation, dispels all delusion. All these three types of training are possible only through the cultivation of constant //mindfulness// (//sati//), which forms the seventh link of the Noble Eightfold Path. Mindfulness is called a controlling faculty (//indriya//) and a spiritual power (//bala//), and is also the first of the seven factors of enlightenment (satta //bojjhanga//).[2] Right Mindfulness (samma-sati) has to be present in every skilful or karmically wholesome thought moment (kusalacitta). It is the basis of all earnest endeavour (appamada) for liberation, and maintains in us the sense of urgency to strive for enlightenment or Nibbana.

The Discourse on the Foundations of Mindfulness, the //Satipatthana Sutta//, is the tenth discourse of the Middle Length Collection (Majjhima Nikaya) of the Discourses of the Enlightened One. It is this version which is translated in the present publication. There is another version of it, in the Collection of Long Discourses (Digha Nikaya No.22), which differs only by a detailed explanation of the Four Noble Truths.

The great importance of the Discourse on Mindfulness has never been lost to the Buddhists of the Theravada tradition. In Sri Lanka, even when the knowledge and practice of the Dhamma was at its lowest ebb through centuries of foreign domination, the Sinhala Buddhists never forgot the Satipatthana Sutta. Memorizing the Sutta has been an unfailing practice among the Buddhists, and even today in Sri Lanka there are large numbers who can recite the Sutta from memory. It is a common sight to see on full-moon days devotees who are observing the Eight Precepts, engaged in community recital of the Sutta. Buddhists are intent on hearing this Discourse even in the last moments of their lives; and at the bedside of a dying Buddhist either monks or laymen recite this venerated text.

In the private shrine room of a Buddhist home, the book of the Satipatthana Sutta is displayed prominently as an object of reverence. Monastery libraries of palm-leaf manuscripts have the Sutta bound in highly ornamented covers.

One such book with this Discourse written in Sinhala script on palm-leaf, has found its way from Sri Lanka as far as the State University Library of Bucharest in Rumania. This was disclosed while collecting material for the Encyclopaedia of Buddhism, when an Esperantist correspondent gave us a list of a hundred books on Buddhism found in the Rumanian University Libraries.

Mindfulness of Breathing
(//Anapana-sati//)

The subjects dealt with in the Satipatthana Sutta are corporeality, feeling, mind and mind objects, being the universe of right Buddhist contemplation for deliverance. A very prominent place in the Discourse is occupied by the discussion on mindfulness of breathing (//anapana-sati//). To make the present publication of greater practical value to the reader, an introductory exposition of the methods of practising that particular meditation will now be given.

Mindfulness of breathing takes the highest place among the various subjects of Buddhist meditation. It has been recommended and praised by the Enlightened One thus: "This concentration through mindfulness of breathing, when developed and practised much, is both peaceful and sublime, it is an unadulterated blissful abiding, and it banishes at once and stills evil unprofitable thoughts as soon as they arise."

Though of such a high order, the initial stages of this meditation are well within the reach of a beginner though he be only a lay student of the Buddha-Dhamma. Both in the Discourse here translated, and in the 118th Discourse of the same Collection (the Majjhima Nikaya), which specifically deals with that meditation, the initial instructions for the practice are clearly laid down:

> Herein, monks, a monk, having gone to the forest or the root of a tree or to an empty place, sits down with his legs crossed, keeps his body erect and his mindfulness alert. Ever mindful he breathes in, mindful he breathes out. Breathing in a long breath, he knows, "I am breathing in a long breath"; breathing out a long breath, he knows, "I am breathing out a long breath." Breathing in a short breath, he knows, "I am breathing in a short breath"; breathing out a short breath, he knows, "I am breathing out a short breath." "Experiencing the whole (breath) body, I shall breathe in," thus he trains himself. "Experiencing the whole (breath-) body, I shall breathe out," thus he trains himself. "Calming the activity of the (breath-) body, I shall breathe in," thus he trains himself. "Calming the activity of the (breath-) body, I shall breathe out," thus he trains himself.

These are instructions given by the Enlightened One to the monks who, after their alms round, had the whole remaining day free for meditation. But what about the lay Buddhist who has a limited time to devote to this practice? Among the places described as fit for the practice of meditation, one is available to all: //sunnagara//, lit. "empty house," may mean any room in the house that has no occupant at that moment, and one may in the course of the twenty-four hours of the day find a room in one's house that is empty and undisturbed. Those who work all day and feel too tired in the evening for meditation may devote the early hours of the morning to the practice of mindfulness of breathing.

The other problem is the right posture for meditation. The full "lotus posture" of the yogi, the //padmasana//, as we see it in the Buddha statues, proves nowadays rather difficult to many, even to easterners. A youthful meditator, however, or even a middle-aged one, can well train himself in that posture in stages. He may, for instance, start with sitting on a low, broad chair or bed, bending only one leg and resting the other on the floor; and so, in gradual approximation, he may finally master that posture. There are also other easier postures of sitting with legs bent, for instance the half-lotus posture. It will be worth one's effort to train oneself in such postures; but if one finds them difficult and uncomfortable at the outset it will not be advisable to delay or disturb one's start with meditation proper on that account. One may allow a special time for sitting-practice, using it as best as one can for contemplation and reflection; but for the time being, the practice of meditation aiming at higher degrees of concentration may better be done in a posture that is comfortable. One may sit on a straight backed chair of a height that allows the legs to rest comfortably on the floor without strain. As soon however, as a cross-legged posture has become more comfortable, one should assume it for the practice of mindfulness of breathing, since it will allow one to sit in meditation for a longer time than is possible on a chair.

The meditator's body and mind should be alert but not tense. A place with a dimmed light will be profitable since it will help to exclude diverting attention to visible objects.

The right place, time and posture are very important and often essential for a successful meditative effort.

Though we have been breathing throughout our life, we have done so devoid of mindfulness, and hence, when we try to follow each breath attentively, we find that the Buddhist teachers of old were right when they compared the natural state of an uncontrolled mind to an untamed calf. Our minds have long been dissipated among visible data and other objects of the senses and of thought, and hence do not yield easily to attempts at mind-control.

Suppose a cowherd wanted to tame a wild calf: he would take it away from the cow and tie it up apart with a rope to a stout post. Then the calf might dash to and fro, but being unable to get away and tired after its effort, it would eventually lie down by the post. So too, when the meditator wants to tame his own mind that has long been reared on the enjoyment of sense objects, he should take it away from places where these sense objects abound, and tie the mind to the post of in-breaths and out-breaths with the rope of mindfulness. And though his mind may then dash to and fro when deprived of its liberty to roam among the sense objects, it will ultimately settle down when mindfulness is persistent and strong.

When practising mindfulness of breathing, attention should be focused at the tip of the nose or at the point of the upper lip immediately below where the current of air can be felt. The meditator's attention should not leave this "focusing point" from where the in-coming and out-going breaths can be easily felt and observed. The meditator may become aware of the breath's route through the body but he should not pay attention to it. At the beginning of the practice, the meditator should concentrate only on the in-breaths and out-breaths, and should not fall into any reflections about them. It is only at a later stage that he should apply himself to the arousing of knowledge and other states connected with the concentration.

In this brief introduction, only the first steps of the beginner can be discussed. For more information the student may refer to the English translation of the //Visuddhimagga// (//The Path of Purification//, chap. VIII) by Bhikkhu Nanamoli, or to //Mindfulness of Breathing// by Bhikkhu Nanamoli, and to //The Heart of Buddhist Meditation// by Nyanaponika Thera. [3]

The lay Buddhist who undertakes this practice will first take the Three Refuges and the Five Precepts; he will review the reflections on the Buddha, Dhamma, and Sangha, transmit thoughts of lovingkindness (//metta//) in all directions, recollect that this meditation will help him to reach the goal of deliverance through direct knowledge and mental calm; and only then should he start with the mindfulness of breathing proper, first by way of counting.4

Counting

The Buddhist teachers of old recommend that a beginner should start the practice by counting the breaths mentally. In doing so he should not stop short of five or go beyond ten or make any break in the series. By stopping short of five breaths his mind has not enough room for contemplation, and by going beyond ten his mind takes the number rather than the breaths for its objects, and any break in the series would upset the meditation.

When counting, the meditator should first count when the in-breath or the out-breath is completed, not when it begins. So taking the in-breath first, he counts mentally 'one' when that in-breath is complete, then he counts 'two' when the out-breath is complete, 'three' after the next in-breath, and so on up to ten, and then again from one to ten, and so he should continue.

After some practice in counting at the completion of a breath, breathing may becoming faster. The breaths, however, should not be made longer or shorter intentionally. The meditator has to be just mindful of their occurrence as they come and go. Now he may try counting 'one' when he //begins// to breathe in or breathe out, counting up to five or ten, and then again from one to five or ten. If one takes both the in-breath and out-breath as 'one', it is better to count only up to five.

Counting should be employed until one can dispense with it in following the sequence of breaths successively. Counting is merely a device to assist in excluding stray thoughts. It is, as it were, a guideline or railing for supporting mindfulness until it can do without such help. There may be those who will feel the counting more as a complication than a help, and they may well omit it, attending directly to the flow of the respiration by way of "connecting the successive breaths."

Connecting

After the counting has been discarded, the meditator should now continue his practice by way of connecting (//anubandhana//); that is, by following mindfully the in and out breaths without recourse to counting, and yet without a break in attentiveness. Here too, the breaths should not be followed beyond the nostrils where the respiratory air enters and leaves. The meditator must strive to be aware of the whole breath, in its entire duration and without missing one single phase, but his attention must not leave the place of contact, the nostrils, or that point of the upper lip where the current of air touches.

While following the in-breaths and out-breaths thus, they become fainter and fainter, and at times it is not easy to remain aware of that subtle sensation of touch caused by the respiration. Keener mindfulness is required to keep track of the breaths then. But if the meditator perseveres, one day he will feel a different sensation, a feeling of ease and happiness, and occasionally there appears before his mental eye something like a luminous star or a similar sign, which indicates that one approaches the stage of access concentration. Steadying the newly acquired sign, one may cultivate full mental absorption (//jhana//) or at least the preliminary concentration as a basis for practising insight.

The practice of mindfulness of breathing is meant for both mental calm and insight (//samatha// and //vipassana//). Direct knowledge being the object of Buddhist meditation, the concentration gained by the meditative practice should be used for the clear understanding of reality as manifest in oneself and in the entire range of one's experience.

Though penetrative insight leading to Nibbana is the ultimate object, progress in mindfulness and concentration will also bring many benefits in our daily lives. If we have become habituated to follow our breaths for a longer period of time and can exclude all (or almost all) intruding irrelevant thoughts, mindfulness, self-control and efficiency are sure to increase in all our activities. Just as our breathing, so also other processes of body and mind, will become clearer to us, and we shall come to know more of ourselves.

It has been said by the Buddha: "Mindfulness of breathing, developed and repeatedly practised, is of great fruit, of great advantage, for it fulfils the four foundations of mindfulness; the four foundations of mindfulness, developed and repeatedly practised, fulfil the seven enlightenment factors; the seven enlightenment factors, developed and repeatedly practised, fulfil clear-vision and deliverance." Clear vision and deliverance, or direct knowledge and the bliss of liberation, are the highest fruit of the application of mindfulness.

INTRODUCTION

The Ven. Acariya Maha Boowa (Bhikkhu Nanasampanno) accepted an invitation to go to England in June 1974 together with two other Bhikkhus, Ven. Pannavaddho and Ven. Abhiceto, originally from the U.K. and Canada respectively. All three had the good fortune to be able to stay at the Dhammapadipa Vihara in Haverstock Hill which was run by the English Sangha Trust. [*] It was there that Acariya Maha Boowa gave the talks recorded in this book, the only exception to this being the discussion on 13th June in the morning at Cambridge, when the Bhikkhus went to receive food at Mr. Benedic Wint's house.

[*] The Vihara in Haverstock Hill Road is now no longer there. The property was disposed of when the Sangha moved to Chithurst in Sussex.

The talks given by Acariya Maha Boowa were tape recorded, but the questions and answers were mostly taken down in shorthand by M.R. Sermsri Kasemsri. It is mainly due to her efforts, not only in taking down the questions and answers, but also in subsequently transcribing all the talks and her shorthand notes and typing out the manuscript, that the Thai book was produced from which this translation was made.

Translation from Thai into English does not normally present any special problems. But in the case of this book the origin of it was the spoken word, and in addition the subject matter is Dhamma which involves many concepts and technicalities for which English has a rather poor vocabulary and often a lack of the necessary fundamental concepts.

The teachings of Buddhism may in fact be compared to a technical subject such as chemistry or electronics in that many technical terms and phrases are necessary, and also special concepts and ways of thinking are needed in order to understand and appreciate the reasoning and truth of Buddhism.

When it comes to a question of whether to translate a technical word (nearly always from the Pali language into English, the reasoning that has been used is approximately as follows: If a word in Pali (or Thai) has a well-known and accurate equivalent in English, then the English word is used (e.g., Sati -- Mindfulness; Panna -- Wisdom). But if there is no well-known or accurate equivalent or if the use of an English word leads to more confusion or misunderstanding than the original Pali word then the Pali word is used (e.g., Samadhi, Jhana).

I must apologise to those people who are not familiar with Pali terms and who find difficulty in reading a book such as this which has many Pali terms, but I feel sure that it is far better for readers to not understand rather than to misunderstand. In any case, following on this introduction is a short list of those Pali words which occur frequently in the book, together with a brief assessment of their meaning so that the reader who is not familiar with those words can have a ready reference. There is also a more complete glossary at the end of the book.

I should like to thank all those who have helped to produce this book, including M.R. Sermsri Kasemsri for her work on the original book in Thai; Mr. Michael Shameklis for his help in translation of the first thirty or so pages; Tan Suchard (Bhikkhu Abhijato) for helping to correct many many translation mistakes, and to Tan Chris (Bhikkhu Cittobhaso) for typing out the manuscript.

Brief list of words that are usually

1. Citta The heart (in the emotional sense, but not the physical heart), the "one who knows" (but often knows wrongly). The nearest English equivalent is the word "mind," except that "mind" is usually understood as being the thinking, reasoning apparatus located in the head, which is too narrow a meaning for the word "Citta".

2. Dhamma (i) the ultimate meaning is that basis which is behind all phenomena and is thus the truth. It is unchanging and is thus not knowable by that which is impermanent.
(ii) in the sense of Buddha Dhamma, meaning those practices and ways of behaviour that conforms to Dhamma and lead one towards Dhamma.

3. Dukkha Discontent, Dissatisfaction, Suffering, Pain, Anguish. Dukkha is a very broad and general term covering all those things that are unpleasant, irritating and disturbing.

4. Kilesas Those defiling states arising from greed, hate, and delusion which constantly tend to lead us against Dhamma.

5. Nibbana That state of the Citta in which all the Kilesas and Dukkha have been eradicated.

6. Samadhi Absorption of the mind when concentrating one pointedly on an object. It has many levels and few people know more than the initial stages of it.

7. Tan Acharn Tan is a Thai word meaning Venerable. Acharn is also Thai and derived from Acariya -- teacher.

8. Vimutti Freedom, Liberation, in the sense of freedom from the Kilesas, Dukkha, and attachment to the mundane relative world (Sammuti).

INTRODUCTION ==========

The sixteen talks translated here are actually reconstructions of Ajaan Lee's talks made by one of his followers--a nun, Arun Abhivanna--based on notes she made whil teach. With a few exceptions--the talks dated 1958 and 1959, which were printed after Aj death--all were checked and approved by Ajaan Lee and printed in a volume entitled, The Insight Meditation, Collected from Four Years' Sermons, or Four Years' Sermons for shor volume runs to more than 600 pages in the Thai original, the first half consisting of aphoris passages, the second half of reconstructions, some fairly fragmentary, others more comp selection here consists of all the reconstructions in Four Years' Sermons that deal directly techniques of breath meditation, plus a number of passages dealing with the values unde practice. To read these talks is, in effect, to eavesdrop on Ajaan Lee while he is tea other people. This point is worth bearing in mind. Ajaan Lee's remarks are directed at pec background, preconceptions and experiences in the practice may or may not coincide wit this reason, his comments should be read selectively. In particular, his descriptior the breath sensations in the body and how to deal with them touch on a matter very subjec subject to change. The way these sensations are experienced varies widely from person t with the same person can change radically with time. For a someone with a Western back Lee's explanations of these sensations will sound strange. They are based partly on Thai unlike Western physiology describes physical processes as they feel from the inside, in ter four basic properties (see dhatu in the Glossary), rather than as they can be measured fror Since in meditation we are exploring the body and mind from the inside, we would do well t ourselves with this approach, and not dismiss it for its strangeness. In any event, Lee's comments are best read as food for thought--pointing out an area to be explored, sug ways to understand and deal with it--and not as hard and fast rules. Meditation is an art a to be mastered by using one's own powers of discernment, sensitivity and observation whil it, and not by adhering blindly to any set system of instructions. Another aspect of th talks that deserves comment is the frequent use of Pali words and phrases. For many rea be unfamiliar; for Ajaan Lee's listeners, though, they were not. They are drawn mostly fron many Thai Buddhists--lay and ordained--repeat daily, or that monks chant at ceremonies ir and homes. For many Thai Buddhists, the chants and the terms are Buddhism, and thus A reference to them to show that they reveal their true meanings only when related to the ex the practice. For the reader unfamiliar with these terms, I have provided a glossary explair important ones at the end of the collection. The remaining terms can be adequately unde their context or, if not, passed over as stylistic devices--of interest to people already acqua them, but by no means necessary for understanding the meaning of what is being said. that these obstacles to eavesdropping on Ajaan Lee will not be deterrent, for the talks inclu among those that I personally have found most useful and inspiring my own practice, and others will find them useful in theirs. INTRODUCTION

Dhamma-Vinaya

Dhamma-Vinaya was the Buddha's own name for the religion he founded. Dhamma -- the discovered and pointed out as advice for all who want to gain release from suffering. Vinay discipline -- is what he formulated as rules, ideals and standards of behavior for those of h who went forth from home life to take up the quest for release in greater earnestness. Alth book deals primarily with discipline, we should note at the outset that Dhamma and Vinaya function only together. Neither without the other can attain the desired goal. In theory the separate, but in the person who practices them they merge as qualities developed in the m character. "Gotami, the qualities of which you may know, 'These qualities lead to di not to passion; to being unfettered and not to being fettered; to self-effacement and not t self-aggrandizement; to modesty and not to ambition; to contentment and not to disconte seclusion, and not to entanglement; to energy and not to idleness; to being unburden to being burdensome': You may definitely hold, 'This is the Dhamma, this is the Vinaya, Teacher's instruction.'" (Cv.X.5) Ultimately, the Buddha said, just as the sea has a sin that of salt, so too the Dhamma and Vinaya have a single taste: that of release. The con between discipline and release is spelled out in a passage that recurs at several points in "Discipline is for the sake of restraint, restraint for the sake of freedom from remorse freedom from remorse for the sake of joy, joy for the sake of rapture, rapture for the sake tranquility, tranquility for the sake of pleasure, pleasure for the sake of concentration, knowledge and vision of release for the sake of total unbinding without clinging." (Pv.XII.

In establishing his religion of release, though, the Buddha did not simply set out a body of recommendations and rules. He also founded a company (//parisa//) of followers. This con four main groups: bhikkhus (monks), bhikkhunis (nuns), lay men, and lay women. Althoug and customs to ensure their stability. This need is what gave rise to the Vinaya. In the years of the Buddha's career, the texts tell us, there was no need to formulate disciplinary

They knew his teachings well and behaved accordingly. The Canon tells of how Ven. Sari replied that the time for such a code had not yet come, for even the most backward of the Community at that time had already had their first glimpse of the goal. Only when mental e (//asava//) made themselves felt in the Community would there be a need for a Patimokkh passed, the conditions that provided an opening for the effluents within the Community eve appear. The Bhaddali Sutta (M.65) presents the Buddha at a later point in his career listi conditions as five: Ven. Bhaddali: "Why is it, venerable sir, that there used to be few

"There are no cases where the conditions that offer a foothold for the effluents hav status...a large body of learning... when the Community is long-standing, then there are

Thus the rules themselves were not the cause for degeneracy in the Community, and the provided a foothold for the effluents were not themselves effluents. Rather, the growing the Community provided the opportunity for bhikkhus to act on the basis of their defilemen variety of ways, and the rules -- although they could not prevent any of the five condition become correspondingly complex to counteract the opportunities those conditions provide behavior. Even when these conditions did arise, though, the Buddha did not set out code at once. Instead, he formulated rules one at a time, in response to events. The consi went into formulating each rule are best illustrated by the events surrounding the formula first. Ven. Sudinna, the story goes, had strong faith in the Buddha and had ordained a receiving his parents' grudging consent. He was their only child and, though married, was parents, fearing that the government would confiscate their property at their death if it ha devised various schemes to lure Ven. Sudinna back to the lay life, but to no avail. Finally, realized that he was firm in his intention to stay a bhikkhu and so asked him at least to ha intercourse with his former wife so that their property would have an heir. Ven. Sudinna co his wife into the forest, and had intercourse three times. Immediately he felt remorse eventually confessed his deed to his fellow bhikkhus. Word reached the Buddha, who call the Community, questioned Ven. Sudinna, and gave him a rebuke. The rebuke fell into tw the first part, the Buddha reminded Ven. Sudinna of his position as a //samana// -- a con and that his behavior was unworthy of his position. Also, the Buddha pointed out to him of teaching and noted that his behavior ran counter to them. The implication here was that had not only acted inconsistently with the content of the teaching, but had also shown call for the Buddha's compassionate aims in making the Dhamma known. "'Misguided r unseemly, unbecoming, unsuitable, and unworthy of a contemplative; improper and not done....Have I not taught the Dhamma in many ways for the sake of dispassion and not unfettering and not for fettering; for letting go and not for clinging? Yet here, while I h taught the Dhamma for dispassion, you set your heart on passion; while I have taught th unfettering, you set your heart on being fettered; while I have taught the Dhamma fo go, you set your heart on clinging. "'Misguided man, haven't I taught the Dhamma in for the fading of passion, the sobering of pride, the subduing of thirst, the destruction attachment, the severing of the round, the depletion of craving, dispassion, stopping, unbinding? Haven't I advocated abandoning sensual pleasures, understanding sensual subduing sensual thirst, destroying sensual preoccupations, calming sensual fevers? man, this neither inspires faith in the faithless nor increases the faithful. Rather, it inspire of faith in the faithless and wavering in some of the faithful.'" The second part of the rebuke dealt in terms of personal qualities: those that a bhikkhu practicing discipline is and those he is to develop. "Then the Blessed One, having in various ways rebuked Sudinna, having spoken in dispraise of being burdensome, demanding, arrogant, discon and indolent; in various ways having spoken in praise of being unburdensome, unde modest, content, austere, scrupulous, gracious, self-effacing, and energetic; having give talk on what is seemly and becoming for bhikkhus, addressed the bhikkhus." Th where the Buddha formulated the training rule, after first stating his reasons for doing so. "'In that case, bhikkhus, I will formulate a training rule for the bhikkhus with ten aims in m excellence of the Community, the peace of the Community, the curbing of the shame comfort of well-behaved bhikkhus, the restraint of effluents related to the present life, the prevention of effluents related to the next life, the arousing of faith in the faithless, th increase of the faithful, the establishment of the true Dhamma, and the fostering of disci These reasons fall into three main types. The first two are external: 1) to ensure peace well-being within the Community itself, and 2) to foster and protect faith among the laity, o the bhikkhus depend for their support. (The origin stories of the various rules depict the lai very quick to generalize. One bhikkhu misbehaves, and they complain, "How can these bh that?") The third type of reason, though, is internal: The rule is to help restrain and preven effluents within the individual bhikkhus. Thus the rules aim not only at the external well-b the Community, but also at the internal well-being of the individual. This latter point soon b apparent to anyone who seriously tries to keep to the rules, for they foster mindfulness a other words, the question is not one of the authority on whose word a claim is based, but o consistency: Only if a statement stands up under comparison with the Canon should it be true Dhamma or Vinaya. The same principle holds for statements that are said to be not th Buddha, but the opinion of respected teachers. This point is borne out by two impor passages in the texts. One is the narrative of the Second Council, during which the bhikl defended ten practices on the grounds that they had learned them from their teachers. Th judged the case, though, insisted on evaluating the practices in terms of whether or not t

Canon's or the teachers' -- was point six: "'The practice of what is habitual, sir -- is it allowable?' "'What is the practice of what is habitual, my friend?' "'To practice (thinking), this is the way my preceptor habitually practiced; this is the way my teacher h practiced -- is this allowable?' "'The practice of what is habitual is sometimes allow sometimes not.'" (CV.XII.2.8) What this means, as the elders showed in the way th the meeting, is that one's teacher's and preceptor's practices are to be followed only whe in accordance with the Canon. The second passage is the discussion of the Great Sta Commentary to the Mahaparinibbana Sutta, which concludes that the commentaries are t where they are in agreement with the Canon. Apparently the teachers who compiled the a commentaries took a more modest view of their authority than did the elders of the Mahav of Buddhaghosa and did not pretend to supersede the Canon as the final word on what is

For this reason, even in instances that the Commentary does not do justice to the Vibhanga, I have tried to give a faithful acc important points from the Commentary so that those who wish to take it as their authority use this book as a guide. If there are any points on which I am mistaken, I would be please knowledgeable people would correct me. At the same time, I hope that this book will there are many areas on which the Vibhanga is unclear and lends itself to a variety of ec interpretations. For proof of this, we need only look at the various traditions that have deve different Theravadin countries, and even within each country. For some reason, althougl be very tolerant of different interpretations of the Dhamma, they can be very intolerant of interpretations of the Vinaya and can get into heated arguments over minor issues having with the training of the mind. I have tried to make the point throughout this book that interpretation based on a sound reading of the Canon should be respected: that each bhi the interpretations of the Community in which he is living, as long as they do not conflict Canon, so as to avoid conflict over minor matters in daily life; and that he should also show the differing interpretations of other Communities where they too do not conflict with the as to avoid the pitfalls of pride and narrow-mindedness. This is especially true now t monasteries of different nationalities are taking root in close proximity to one another in t In the past, Thais, Burmese, and Sri Lankans could look down on one another's traditions causing friction, as they lived in separate countries and spoke different languages. Now, have become neighbors and have begun to speak common languages, so it is best that w writings of the Chinese pilgrims who visited India centuries ago. Theirs is a worthy example. We should not let our minor differences become stu our way. My aim throughout this book has been practical. I have avoided dealing wi issues concerning the authenticity and reliability of the tradition, and instead have tried sim report and explain what the tradition has to say. Of course, I have had to be selective. Wha unconscious factors that have influenced my choice of material, the conscious considerati this book are briefly as follows: We are dealing primarily with rules, but rules are not th way to express disciplinary norms, and the texts we are surveying express their norms in forms: as rules, principles, models, and virtues. The different forms are best suited for di purposes. Principles, models, and virtues are meant as personal, subjective standards an loosely defined. Their interpretation and application are left to the judgment of the indivi Rules are meant to serve as more objective standards. To work, they must be precisely de acceptable to the Community at large. The compilers of the Canon, recognizing this nee definitions for most of the terms in the rules, and the authors of the commentaries continue carrying it out with even greater thoroughness. Thus much of this book, in reporting thes concerned with the definition of terms. This need for precision, though, accounts for th of rules in general as universal guides to behavior. First, there is the question of where t line between what is and is not an infraction of the rule. A clear break-off point is needed b rules -- unlike principles -- deal in two colors: black and white. In some cases, it is difficult a clear break-off point that corresponds exactly to one's sense of what is right and wrong, is necessary to include the areas of gray either with the white or the black. In general, but the Vibhanga's position is to include the gray with the white, and to rely on the principles Dhamma to encourage the individual bhikkhu to stay away from the gray. Take, for i rule against masturbation. The Vibhanga limits this rule to forbidding only those forms of m that aim at ejaculation, for if it had drawn the line anywhere else, it would have become a for a bhikkhu simply to scratch himself. Thus self-stimulation that does not aim at ejaculati an offense, although in many cases it is clearly against the spirit of the Dhamma. The Vina disapprovingly, a number of older Vinaya guides that like to dwell on these areas of gray delight in figuring out ways to avoid an offense by working around the letter of the rules. In am taking a different tack: Under those rules that include large areas of grey with the wh noted a few relevant principles from the Dhamma to spell out a wise policy with regard to t -- not to reformulate the rule, but simply as a reminder that, as noted above, the Vinaya Dhamma does not suffice as a guide to the goal. Another drawback resulting from th precision in rules is that the more precisely a rule is defined to suit a particular time and the less well it may fit other times and places. The compilers of the Canon, in order to mak weakness, thus provided the origin stories and precedents to show the type of situation intended to prevent, providing principles and models that indicate the spirit of the rule and applying it to differing contexts. In writing this book I have often made reference to these to give this added dimension. Admittedly, the stories do not make for inspiring reading example, instead of reading about bhikkhus accepting a meal at a donor's house and then donor with a talk on Dhamma, we read about Ven. Udayin accepting a meal at the dwellin who was his former wife, and the two of them sitting there exposing their genitals to each the stories do remind us that the more inspiring stories we read in the discourses took p very real human world, and they also reveal the insight and understated wit of those who f interpreted the rules. The element of wit here is especially important, for without it there true understanding of human nature, and no intelligent system of discipline. Finally, compiling this book, I have tried to include whatever seems most worth knowing for the bh fostering the qualities of discipline in his life -- so as to help train his mind and live in pea with his fellow bhikkhus -- and for anyone who wants to support and encourage the bhikkh

"The wise, they go out like this flame."

The discourses of the Pali Canon make a frequent analogy between the workings of fire and those of the mind: The mind unawakened to the supreme goal is like a burning fire; the awakened mind, like a fire gone out. The analogy is made both indirectly & directly: indirectly in the use of terminology borrowed from the physics of fire to describe mental events (the word nibbana being the best-known example); directly in any number of metaphors:

I have heard that on one occasion, when the Master was newly Awakened--living at Uruvela by the banks of the Neranjara River in the shade of the Bodhi tree, the tree of Awakening--he sat in the shade of the Bodhi tree for seven days in one session, sensitive to the bliss of release. At the end of seven days, after emerging from that concentration, he surveyed the world with the eye of an Awakened One. As he did so, he saw living beings burning with the many fevers and aflame with the many fires born of passion, aversion, & delusion....

Ud iii.10

The All is aflame. What All is aflame? The eye is aflame. Forms are aflame. Visual cognition is aflame. Visual contact is aflame. And whatever there is that arises in dependence on visual contact, experienced as pleasure, pain or neither pleasure nor pain, that too is aflame. Aflame with what? Aflame with the fire of passion, the fire of aversion, the fire of delusion. Aflame, I tell you, with birth, ageing & death, with sorrows, lamentations, pains, griefs, & despairs.
The ear is aflame. Sounds are aflame...
The nose is aflame. Odors are aflame...
The tongue is aflame. Flavors are aflame...
The body is aflame. Tactile sensations are aflame...
The intellect is aflame. Ideas are aflame. Mental cognition is aflame. Mental contact is aflame. And whatever there is that arises in dependence on mental contact, experienced as pleasure, pain or neither pleasure nor pain, that too is aflame. Aflame with what? Aflame with the fire of passion, the fire of aversion, the fire of delusion. Aflame, I tell you, with birth, ageing & death, with sorrows, lamentations, pains, griefs, & despairs.

S xxxv.28

The fire of passion burns in a man excited with sensual desires;
The fire of aversion, in an angry man taking life;
The fire of delusion, in a bewildered man ignorant of the Noble Teaching.

Not understanding these fires, people
--fond of self-identity-- unreleased from the shackles of death, Swell the ranks of purgatory,
the wombs of common animals, demons,
the realm of the hungry shades.
While those who, day & night, follow the teachings of the rightly self-awakened one,
Put out the fire of passion, constantly focusing on the repulsive.
They, the highest men, put out the fire of aversion with mercy,
And the fire of delusion with the insight leading to penetration.
They, the masterful, by night & day, having put out (the fires),
Go totally out,
without remainder,
having totally comprehended stress,
without remainder.

They, the expert, with an attainer-of-wisdom's noble vision with regard to right knowing, Fully knowing the passing away of birth, return to no further becoming.*
Iti 93

Not only is the extinguishing of passion, aversion & delusion compared to the extinguishing of a fire, but so is the passing away of a person in whom they are extinguished.

Ended the old,
there is no new taking birth: Dispassioned their minds towards future becoming,
they, without seed,
inclined to no-growth,

the wise, they go out like this flame.
Khp 6

Sister Sumedha:
This, without ageing,
this without death,
this, the unageing, undying state with no sorrow rivalry bonds
with no burning....
Thig xvi.1

When the Master was totally gone out--simultaneously with the total going out--Ven. Anuruddha uttered these stanzas:

He had no in-&-out breathing,
The one who was Such*, the firm-minded one.
Free from want, evincing peace,
the sage completing his span.
With heart unbowed
he endured the pain.
Like a flame's going out was the liberation of awareness.

The aim of this essay is to explore the implications of this imagery--to give a sense of what it was & was not intended to convey--by first making reference to the views concerning the physics of fire current in the Buddha's time. This, short of an actual experience of Awakening--something no book can provide--seems the most natural approach for drawing the proper inferences from this imagery. Otherwise, we are bound to interpret it in terms of our own views of how fire works, a mistake as misleading & anachronistic as that of painting a picture of the Buddha dressed as Albert Einstein or Isaac Newton.

The presentation here is more like a photomosaic than an exposition. Quotations have been aligned & overlapped so as to reflect & expand on one another. Comments have intentionally been kept to a bare minimum, so as to allow the quotations to speak for themselves. The weakness of this approach is that it covers several fronts at once, and can make its points only incrementally. Its strength lies in its cumulative effect: revealing--beneath apparently disparate teachings--unifying patterns that might go unnoticed in a more linear narrative, much as satellite pictures can reveal buried archeological remains that would go unnoticed by a person standing on the ground.

One of the noteworthy features of the Pali Canon is that common patterns of thought & imagery shape the extemporaneous words of a wide variety of people reported within it. Here we will hear the voices not only of the Buddha--the speaker in all passages from the Canon where none is unidentified--but also of lay people such as Citta, monks such as Vens. Ananda & Maha Kaccana, and nuns such as Sisters Nanda, Sumedha, & Patacara. Each has his or her own style of expression, both in poetry & in prose, but they all speak from a similarity of background & experience that makes it possible to view their message as a single whole, in structure as well as content.

The structure we are most concerned with here centers around the image of extinguished fire and its implications for the word 'nibbana' (nirvana) & related concepts. Used with reference to fire, nibbana means 'being out' or 'going out.' Used with reference to the mind, it refers to the final goal and to the goal's attainment. Our essay into the cluster of meanings surrounding this word is meant to read like a journey of exploration, but a brief preview will help us keep track both of where we are in relation to the map provided by the Abstract and of where we are going.

The first chapter surveys ancient Vedic ideas of fire as subsisting in a diffused state even when extinguished, and it then shows how the Buddha took an original approach to those ideas to illustrate the concept of nibbana after death as referring not to eternal existence, but rather to absolute freedom from all constraints of time, space, & being.

The remaining three chapters deal with the concept of nibbana in the present life. Chapter II introduces a cluster of Buddhist ideas concerning the nature of burning fire--as agitated, clinging, bound, & dependent--and draws out the implications that these ideas have for what happens when a fire goes out and, in parallel fashion, when the mind attains nibbana. In particular, it concludes that of all the etymologies traditionally offered for nibbana, Buddhaghosa's 'unbinding' is probably closest to the original connotations of the term.

Chapter III takes up the notion of clinging as it applies to the mind--as sensuality, views, precepts & practices, and doctrines of the self--to show in detail what is loosened in the mind's unbinding, whereas Chapter IV shows how, by detailing the way in which the practice of virtue, concentration & discernment frees the mind from its fetters. This final chapter culminates in an array of passages from the texts that recapitulate the pattern of fire-&-freedom imagery covered in the preceding discussion. If read reflectively, they also serve as reminders that their perspectives on the concept of nibbana can best be connected only in light of that pattern.

We should note at the outset, though, that nibbana is only one of the Buddhist goal's many names. One section of the Canon lists 33, and the composite impression they convey is worth bearing in mind:

The unfashioned, the end,
the effluentless*, the true, the beyond,
the subtle, the very-hard-to-see,
the ageless, permanence, the undecaying,
the featureless, non-differentiation,
peace, the deathless,
the exquisite, bliss, solace,
the exhaustion of craving,

the wonderful, the marvelous,
the secure, security,
nibbana,
the unafflicted, the passionless, the pure,
release, non-attachment,
the island, shelter, harbor, refuge, the ultimate.

Introduction

Unshakable deliverance of the mind is the highest goal in the Buddha's doctrine. Here, deliverance means: the freeing of the mind from all limitations, fetters, and bonds that tie it to the Wheel of Suffering, to the Circle of Rebirth. It means: the cleansing of the mind of all defilements that mar its purity; the removing of all obstacles that bar its progress from the mundane (lokiya) to the supramundane consciousness (lokuttara-citta), that is, to Arahatship.

Many are the obstacles which block the road to spiritual progress, but there are five in particular which, under the name of hindrances (nivarana), are often mentioned in the Buddhist scriptures:

1. Sensual desire (kamacchanda),

2. Ill-will (byapada),

3. Sloth and torpor (thina-middha),

4. Restlessness and remorse (uddhacca-kukkucca),

5. Sceptical doubt (vicikiccha).

They are called "hindrances" because they hinder and envelop the mind in many ways, obstructing its development (bhavana). According to the Buddhist teachings, spiritual development is twofold: through tranquillity (samatha-bhavana) and through insight (vipassana-bhavana). Tranquillity is gained by complete concentration of the mind during the meditative absorptions (jhana). For achieving these absorptions, the overcoming of the five hindrances, at least temporarily, is a preliminary condition. It is especially in the context of achieving the absorptions that the Buddha often mentions the five hindrances in his discourses.

There are five mental constituents which are chiefly representative of the first meditative absorption, and are therefore called the factors of absorption (jhananga). For each of these there is, according to Buddhist commentarial tradition, one of the five hindrances that is specifically harmful for it and excludes its higher development and refinement to the degree required for jhana; and on the other hand, the cultivation of these five factors beyond their average level will be an antidote against the hindrances, preparing the road to jhana. The relationship between these two groups of five is indicated in this anthology, under the heading of the respective hindrance.

Not only the meditative absorptions but also lesser degrees of mental concentration are impeded by these five hindrances. So is the "neighbourhood" (or "access") concentration (upacarasamadhi), being the preliminary stage for the fully absorbed concentration (appana) reached in jhana. Likewise excluded by the presence of the hindrances is the momentary concentration (khanikasamadhi) which has the strength of neighbourhood concentration and is required for mature insight (vipassana). But apart from these higher stages of mental development, any earnest attempt at clear thinking and pure living will be seriously affected by the presence of these five hindrances.

This widespread harmful influence of the five hindrances shows the urgent necessity of breaking down their power by constant effort. One should not believe it sufficient to turn one's attention to the hindrances only at the moment when one sits down for meditation. Such last-minute effort in suppressing the hindrances will rarely be successful unless helped by previous endeavour during one's ordinary life.

One who earnestly aspires to the unshakable deliverance of the mind should, therefore, select a definite "working-ground" of a direct and practical import: a kammatthana [1] in its widest sense, on which the structure of his entire life should be based. Holding fast to that "working-ground," never losing sight of it for long, even this alone will be a considerable and encouraging progress in the control and development of the mind, because in that way the directive and purposive energies of mind will be strengthened considerably. One who has chosen the conquest of the five hindrances for a "working-ground" should examine which of the five are strongest in one's personal case. Then one should carefully observe how, and on which occasions, they usually appear. One should further know the positive forces within one's own mind by which each of these hindrances can best be countered and, finally, conquered; and one should also examine one's life for any opportunity of developing these qualities which, in the following pages, have been indicated under the headings of the spiritual faculties (indriya), the factors of absorption (jhananga), and the factors of enlightenment (bojjhanga). In some cases, subjects of meditation have been added which will be helpful in overcoming the respective hindrances.

By the "worldling" (puthujjana),[2] however, only a temporary suspension and partial weakening of the hindrances can be attained. Their final and complete eradication takes place on the stages of sanctity (ariyamagga):

Doubt is eliminated on the first stage, the path of stream-entry (sotapatti-magga).

Sensual desire, ill will and remorse are eliminated on the third stage, the path of non-returner (anagami-magga)

Sloth and torpor and restlessness are eradicated on the path of Arahatship (arahatta-magga).

Hence the reward of the fight against the hindrances is not only the limited one of making possible a shorter or longer spell of meditation, but every step in weakening these hindrances takes us nearer to the stages of sanctity where deliverance from these hindrances is unshakable.

Though most of the following texts, translated from the Discourses of the Buddha and the commentaries, are addressed to monks, they are likewise valid for those living the worldly life. As the Old Masters say: "The monk (bhikkhu) is mentioned here as an example of those dedicated to the practice of the Teaching. Whosoever undertakes that practice is here included in the term 'monk.' "

was born in 1915 to a small farming family in the province of Chanthaburi, near the Cambod southeastern Thailand. Orphaned at the age of eleven, he was raised in a series of monast ordination as a monk when he turned twenty. As he began to study the monastic discipline, realized that the monks of his monastery were not really serious about practicing the Buddh and he longed to find a teacher who would give him a training more in line with what he had chance came during his second year as a monk, when Ajaan Lee Dhammadharo, a membe tradition founded by Ajaan Mun Bhuridatto, came to set up a meditation monastery in an old outside of Chanthaburi. Taken with Ajaan Lee's teachings, Ajaan Fuang reordained in the s Ajaan Lee belonged, and joined him at his new monastery.From that point onward, with few spent every Rains Retreat under Ajaan Lee's guidance until the latter's death in 1961. One exceptions was a five-year period he spent during World War II, meditating alone in the fore Thailand. Another was a six-year period in the early fifties when Ajaan Lee left Ajaan Fuang the Chanthaburi monastery and wandered about various parts of Thailand in preparation for settle down near Bangkok. When in 1957 Ajaan Lee founded Wat Asokaram, his new mona Ajaan Fuang joined him there, to help in what was to be the last major project of Ajaan Lee's Ajaan Lee's death, Ajaan Fuang was generally expected to become abbot at Wat Asokaram that time, though, had grown into such a large, unwieldy community that he did not want the 1965, when the Supreme Patriarch of Thailand, in residence at Wat Makut Kasatriyaram (Th King's Crown) in Bangkok, asked him to spend the Rains Retreat at his temple, to teach me to any of the other monks at the temple who were interested, Ajaan Fuang jumped at the ch total of three Rains Retreats at Wat Makut, wander-ing about the countryside looking for soli dry seasons. Although he had immense respect for the Supreme Patriarch as an individual, the politicking he saw at the higher ecclesiastical levels, and so began looking for a way out 1968, when a woman named Khun Nai Sombuun Ryangrit donated land to the Patriarch for mountainous region near the coast of Rayong province, not far from Chanthaburi. PREFACE

We have come into this world at a remarkable time, one of those brief periods when the teachings of a Buddha are readily available. There is his Noble Eightfold Path of wisdom, morality and concentration and specifically the technique of vipassana meditation by means of which we can train our minds to see the ultimate nature of all phenomena of the world, their transience, unsatisfactoriness and essencelessness. With the development of this detached wisdom, our minds gradually lose their tensions, anguish and lust, and so real peace and happiness can develop.

This article is written in all humility by one who has just begun to walk on the Path, in the spirit of "ehipassiko," the characteristic of the Dhamma that invites all to come and see and try it. There is yet a long way to travel, but there is no doubt whatsoever that the Path leads to the Goal and so this article is an expression of the mind's wish to encourage and urge others to undertake for themselves this profoundly beneficial task of eliminating ignorance and craving and so end all suffering.

INTRODUCTION

All the teachings of the Buddha had one goal -- the elimination of all suffering, all grief, misery, pain and anguish. All the kinds of meditation he explained were designed to train the mind of the student to become detached from all the phenomena of the world, within and outside of himself. This is the aim of Buddhist meditation because detachment is the opposite of //tanha// or craving and it is this //tanha// that is the source of all the sorts of suffering experienced by sentient beings. This desire is very deeply ingrained in our minds because of our ignorance about the real nature of the phenomena of the world. So, vipassana, insight-meditation techniques of the Buddha, are designed to enable us to penetrate our illusions about the nature of reality which are perpetuated by our inaccurate perception of the world and ourselves. Insight has to be gained into the impermanent, unsatisfactory and essenceless nature of all conditioned phenomena, of everything mental and physical, all of which is the effect of certain causes. Insight is often conceived of as a magical experience suddenly just happening and instantly making all things clear. But, by and large, insight develops slowly and gradually through the careful process of observation, investigation and analysis of phenomena until the ultimate nature that lies behind their apparent, conventional truth is distinctly and indubitably perceived. It is this process known in Pali as //dhammavicaya// (Investigation of Dhamma) and also the closely related one of //yoniso-manasikara// (systematic attention) which will be examined here. Ledi Sayadaw in this //Bodhipakkhiya Dipani// [*] defines //dhammavicaya// as identical with //panna// (wisdom) and //Samma Ditthi// (Right Understanding of View) and then describes the investigative process with the simile: "Just as cotton seeds are milled, carded, etc., so as to produce cotton wool, the process of repeatedly viewing the five khandhas (our personal aggregates of body, perception, feeling, volitions and consciousness) with the functions of //insight knowledge (vipassana nana)// is called //dhammavicaya//." First the subjects to be investigated, or the contents of the investigation for insight leading to liberation, will be examined. Then the role of //dhammavicaya// specifically as a part of vipassana meditation will be discussed. Then will come the role of systematic attention in preventing the arising of the mental hindrances which can block progress in meditation and as one of the basic factors conducive to the growth of wisdom. Finally the way to use investigation of Dhamma with the other Factors of Enlightenment and then with the elements of the Noble Eightfold Path are shown. A well-trained, well-controlled mind is a powerful tool capable of rationally thinking through and continually comprehending the ultimate truths of existence. By developing the mind's ability to penetratingly and objectively investigate, we are working to free ourselves of all ignorance, and thus of all craving and its resultant suffering.

Contents of Investigation

Investigation of Dhamma is one of the key factors, the development of which can lead us to liberation from all suffering. The Buddha defines this //dhammavicaya// as "searching, investigation, scrutinizing, for insight into one's own personal conditions ... and ... externals." //dhammavicaya// is one of the Seven Bojjhangas or Factors of Enlightenment and usually translated [*] as "Investigation of Dhamma." The word "Dhamma" has two quite distinct uses and so investigation of it implies both analysis of //the Dhamma// -- the essential truths of existence as taught by the Buddha, and analysis of //dhammas// -- all things whatsoever. Investigation of the Dhamma must include careful thought leading to a thorough understanding of at least these teachings: the Four Noble Truths, the Three Salient Characteristics of Existence, and the Doctrine of Dependent Origination, and some idea of the workings of kamma. When we study the dhammas, we are primarily concerned with determining for ourselves the ultimate nature of our own Five Aggregates, the mind-and-matter phenomenon, with its six sense organs and of the six respective classes of sense objects which are the basis of all consciousness, contact, feeling, perception and mental activities.

[*] //Kindred Sayings//. (Translation of //Samyutta Nikaya//). 5 vols. Pali Text Society, London. (Quoted as:) K.S., V, p.93.

When we investigate the Dhamma, we are trying to thoroughly understand and grasp the significance of the Teachings of the Buddha. These truths are things which he discovered for himself and therefore knew with total certainty. For us to just accept them on faith alone will not be of too much benefit. In the well-known discourse the Buddha gave to the Kalamas, he said, "Be ye not misled by report or tradition or hearsay ... Nor out of respect of the recluse (who holds it). But Kalamas, when you know for yourselves: 'These things are unprofitable, these things are blameworthy,' ... then indeed do ye reject them ... But if at any time ye know for yourselves: 'These things ... when performed and undertaken conduce to profit and happiness,' -- then Kalamas, do ye, having undertaken them, abide therein." [*] And he intended that the Kalamas treat his words just like those of any other teacher. We must explore the teachings of the Buddha thoroughly, carefully and rationally for ourselves by taking the Four Noble Truths, the Three Salient Characteristics, and the Doctrine of Dependent Origination (including Kamma) as working hypotheses which are to be understood and demonstrated to the satisfaction of our own minds. Even if on first contact with these ideas we cannot understand them, we must not for that reason alone reject them out of hand -- this kind of attitude will block and prevent all our progress on the Path. After all, it is quite reasonable to assume that there have been people in the world wiser than ourselves and that the Buddha was one of them. Once we have worked even a little on the Path and gained some benefit from it, we know that the Buddha was far wiser than we are as it was he who first taught this means of liberation. So we willingly keep our minds open to explore what he says even if it does not initially make much sense to our limited way of thinking. On the basis of full comprehension of these Truths gained by this balance between an open mind and confidence, liberating wisdom automatically must grow.

1. The Four Noble Truths

The first aspect of the Dhamma to deal with is the Four Noble Truths: Suffering, its Origin, its Cessation and the way leading to the Cessation of Suffering, the central teaching of the Buddha, because "It is through not understanding, not penetrating the Four Ariyan truths that we have run on, wandered on, this long, long road" of Samsara, (K.S., V, p. 365).

We must carefully consider the nature of life to determine for ourselves whether it is essentially happy or unhappy, satisfactory or unsatisfactory, full of joy or woe. No matter what we look at -- our body, our mind, the external world -- if we penetrate the apparent superficial truth of it, we are bound to find that //dukkha// (suffering) predominates vastly over //sukha// (happiness) because all the seemingly pleasant experiences and aspects of life are doomed to fade away and leave behind them the same state of unsatisfiedness that was there before the momentary respite given by the sensual pleasure. If we think about the nature of the body, obviously it //has// to grow old, get sick and ultimately die and at almost no moment from the time of birth do we find ourselves in perfect health; and from then on it is all a downhill battle since death is the only possible outcome of life. If we keep this in mind, how can we say there is lasting satisfaction or happiness in life? Ledi Sayadaw puts it this way in the //magganga Dipanii// [*] "From the time of conception there is not a single moment ... when there is no liability to destruction. When actual destruction comes, manifold is the suffering that is experienced." If we examine our minds, there, too, we see that the vast majority of the time they are in some unhappy state -- ranging from mild dissatisfaction through anxiety to downright despair. Only rarely are there moments of joy and to these we react by attempting to cling to them, and that state of desiring, too, is //dukkha//. If we look to the external world that we learn about through our senses and realize how many people are in agony with dread disease, how many sentient beings are preying on one another for food, for sport, for power, how many are dying lonely and helpless -- at this very moment -- we cannot doubt that //dukkha// predominates. The Buddha summarizes the First Noble Truth saying, "Birth is suffering, death is suffering, sorrow is suffering; not to get what one desires is suffering; in short all the Five groups of existence are suffering." (Digha Nikaya 22). We have to investigate and see just how it is that all existence is //dukkha//, and one way to do this is to ponder over the "sights" of suffering seen by the Buddha before his Enlightenment, which caused him to leave home and seek the ultimate liberation for Suffering. We would do well to consider an old being, a seriously ill person, and a corpse. Such attention to these will teach us a great deal about both internal and external //dukkha//.

[*] Translated as //The Noble Eightfold Path and its Factors Explained// in The Wheel No. 245/247.

In order to find our way out of all this suffering, we have to be very clear about its cause, and as the Buddha saw it, //tanha// (clinging, craving, desire, lust, etc.) is the basic cause of dukkha. "From craving springs grief, from craving springs fear," from all kinds of craving unhappiness comes; from endearment, affection, attachment, lust (as well as from the negative side of it: hatred, aversion, ill-will) (Dhp. v. 216). Craving is in itself //dukkha//, and it inevitably leads to more ill in this and in future existences. To realize how this is true, so that we are convinced of the necessity of giving up absolutely all craving, we have to examine the workings of our own mind thoroughly. We must observe how our mind is virtually always engaged in some form of craving or desire -- either positively reaching out for some object or obversely trying to push something away -- whether the object is gross or subtle. While we are actually craving for some object -- be it something as mundane as food or as lofty as rebirth among the Brahma gods -- we are in a state of mind that is unsatisfied, that is incomplete and longing for completion -- this lack of satisfaction, of completionness, is //dukkha//. Then, if we should attain the object, our //tanha// does not disappear; it is actually reinforced and more //dukkha// results. Getting what we want may lead to a new object for desire, or to modify the original one to avoid boredom. But satisfying //one// craving does nothing to eliminate the basic mental process of //tanha//; in fact more fuel is simply added to its fires when we obtain what is wanted. If the desired state, experience or thing is unobtainable, then a more acute form of //dukkha// results -- frustration. And if we consider the feelings associated with the negative form of //tanha//, aversion, they are always clearly unhappy, //dukkha//. Thus we can determine for ourselves how //tanha// causes all our suffering in this lifetime.

Craving (//tanha//) is also the cause of rebirth, and once there is a new life the whole chain of //dukkha// inevitably culminating in death automatically comes into play. Most of us, cannot know the phenomenon of rebirth directly for ourselves as the Buddha did, but we certainly see the logic in it. All kinds of craving, if looked at carefully, turn out to be just different forms or manifestations of the underlying desire to perpetuate our existence. The great power of this force pushing for life does not just vanish at the time of death, but these urgings for renewed existence (//bhava sankharas//) become the cause of rebirth in the appropriate place. Most of these forces in sentient beings are not wholesome, so when most beings die and the life continua take a new form, it is in the Realms of Woe. Thus we can see how //tanha// produces a new life with all the //dukkha// that comes along with it. Seeing how much suffering is experienced, all because of craving, surely is strong motivation for us to figure out how to eliminate this //tanha//.

The Third Noble Truth says that there //is// a cessation of suffering; and suffering will and must cease when the cause (//tanha//) is eliminated. "For who is wholly free from craving there is no grief, whence fear?" (Dhp. v. 216). Any phenomena which arise due to causes and conditions have to pass away when those causes cease to operate. So, if we ponder on it, we must conclude that the vital task for us is to root out all our tendencies to crave; all our desires and aversions irrespective of their objects must be given up if we are to be liberated of //dukkha//. To become utterly detached from every thing, state of mind or experience on any plane of existence, to see that absolutely nothing is worth clinging to: this is the wisdom that must be cultivated by investigating all such phenomena. The insight thus gained will necessarily eliminate all desires and so all //dukkha//.

The Noble Eightfold Path was the means given by the Buddha to gain this liberating wisdom. It is by clearly understanding and following the steps of the Path that we gain the insight that there is nothing worth craving for. As this insight deepens through more and more thought on the subject, //tanha// decreases and eventually must disappear, and so we free ourselves of all suffering. The Path is divided into three sections: morality (//sila//), concentration (//samadhi//), and wisdom (//panna//). It is through the practice of //sila// that //samadhi// can develop and through //samadhi//, //panna//. The eight steps of the Path are all actually to be developed, not consecutively, but at any opportune time as they feed into one another at every stage. (For a detailed discussion of the Path, please see the final section of this paper.) There is a well-known analogy which describes the respective roles of morality, concentration and wisdom, and if we examine the simile carefully, we will come to understand how we must proceed in order to eliminate our //tanha//. A thirsty man comes to a pond overgrown with weeds and he wishes to drink the water in the pool. If he pushes the weeds aside with his hands and quickly gets a sip or two from in between them, it is like practicing virtue (//sila//), restraining the gross verbal and bodily actions by very temporary means. If the man somehow fences off a small area of the pond keeping all the weeds outsides the fence, this is like meditative concentration //samadhi// where even unwholesome thoughts disappear for a time, but they are only suppressed and can reappear if the fence breaks down. But if the man uproots every single weed in the pond leaving the water really pure and potable, this is like wisdom (//panna//). It actually only through wisdom, through constantly seeing things as they really are -- changing, unsatisfactory, essenceless -- that the subconscious, latent tendencies to craving are totally rooted out, never again to return. By means of careful investigation we can thus understand how the Fourth Noble Truth, the Noble Eight-Fold Path operates, how "Right View, Right Aim, Right Speech, Right Action, Right Livelihood, Right Effort, Right Mindfulness, Right Concentration if cultivated and made much of, end in the restraint of lust, ends in the restraint of hatred, ends in the restraint of illusion" (K.S., V, p. 5). Having thoroughly investigated, understood and penetrated these Four Noble Truths, we are bound to eventually put an end to our wanderings in //Samsara// and to all our suffering.

2. The Three Signata (//Ti-lakkhana//)

Investigation of Dhamma for full liberation also must include, in addition to the Four Noble Truths, a study of the Three Universal Characteristics or Signata of existence, (//ti-lakkhana//): //anicca// -- impermanence, //dukkha// -- suffering, and //anatta// -- essencelessness. Everything in the universe, mental or physical, inside or outside of us, real or imaginary, that comes into being due to causes and conditions, has these three traits as its nature. And since there is nothing that exists without depending on other things, there is absolutely nothing which we can determine to be permanent, full of happiness only, or having any real substance. We must examine these three truths very carefully to know how thoroughly and totally they apply in all cases. Once there is this deep insight into the nature of reality, detachment and thereby liberation follow.

The first of these to be investigated and in some ways the characteristic that underlies the other two is //anicca// -- the utterly transitory, ephemeral, unstable nature off all mental and physical phenomena. On the level of the apparent truth, we know quite well that things change but we have to train ourselves to see how the process of change is going on continually at every instant in everything. How else could the gross conventional alterations like maturing and aging actually come about? We have to carefully examine all the evidence we can find to comprehend the profundity of the //anicca//-nature of existence. There is nothing which we can think of that would be as we know it conventionally if things were permanently stable. Change is synonymous with life -- our bodies could not exist, let alone function, if the elements of which they are made remained constant or unchanged for even a brief time. Our minds could neither feel nor think nor perceive nor be conscious, if the mind were unalterable in nature. Likewise in inanimate objects, change is essential although sometimes less apparent. We must thoroughly investigate this universal trait so that we can get beyond the limited scope of our usual perception which mistakenly takes apparent form for ultimate reality. Because of the incredible rapidity with which both mind and matter alter, we can only occasionally notice that a particular change has come about; we are never able to perceive the continual ongoing process of change which actually makes up existence. Everything is just in a state of flux, always becoming something else, never, really stopping to //be// something; all //nama// (mind) and all //rupa// (matter) are just a continual series of risings and vanishings following very rapidly one after the other. The ultimate reality of everything is just these vibrations. The importance of really knowing //anicca// is described by the Buddha with the simile of a farmer ploughing his field. "In the autumn season a ploughman ploughing with a great ploughshare, cuts through the spreading roots as he ploughs, even so, brethren, the perceiving of impermanence, if practiced and enlarged, wears out all sensual lust, wears out all ignorance, wears out, tears out all conceit of 'I am'... Just as, brethren, in the autumn season (after the monsoon rains) when the sky is opened up and cleared of clouds, the sun, leaping forth up into the firmament, drives away all darkness from the heavens, and shines and burns and flashes forth; even so, brethren, the perceiving of impermanence, if practices and enlarged, wears out all sensual lust, wears out all lust for the body, all desire for rebirth all ignorance, wears out, tears out all conceit of 'I am'" (K.S., III, p. 132-33).

The characteristic of //dukkha// has been dealt with on the grosser level as the First Noble Truth, in which the suffering of illness, age, of separation from the desired and association with the undesired, in our own minds and bodies and in the external world and in the external world were considered. but there are many subtle ways in which we can see how life is -- and must be -- unsatisfying. It has been seen how life is inseparable from change, how without the perpetual process of development and disintegration there would and could be no existence at all. And yet there is the very profound contradiction between this //anicca//-nature of life and our constant desire and wish for stability, for security, for lasting happiness. If a situation is pleasant, we always hope that it will last and try our utmost to make it do so; but all experiences of life are doomed to pass away as everything on which they are based is completely impermanent, changing at every moment. So all our desires (and we are almost never without some form of //tanha// in our minds) are bound to be frustrated in the long run; we can never find the durable satisfaction we seek in this world of mind and matter. There is nothing in this universe of //anicca// that has even the potential capability of giving any real happiness because each and every things is so completely unstable. We have to give careful attention to all the apparently pleasant and happy experiences that come in through the six sense doors (five physical ones and the mind as the sixth), to see whether they really can bring us satisfaction. The Buddha warns: "In him, brethren, who contemplates the enjoyment that there is in all that makes for grasping, (in all the sense pleasures) craving grows ... Such is the uprising of this entire mass of ill." If we analyze how we ourselves develop strong //tanha// -- and in inevitable consequence //dukkha// -- when we think about and dwell on our pleasurable experiences, we can come to see how this fearful irony of pain caused by considering pleasure unwisely is all too true. With this understanding, then, we will instead contemplate //dukkha// in these same phenomena because, "In him, brethren, who contemplates the misery that there is in all that makes for grasping, craving ceases ... Such is the ceasing of this entire mass of ill." (K.S., II, p. 59). As we are able to comprehend this //dukkha//-nature of everything more and more, naturally the mind will cease to long for that which it knows cannot bring happiness. And so the mind grows detached and moves toward liberation.

The third universal characteristic, //anatta// -- essencelessness, soullessness, egolessness -- is the teaching unique to the Buddhas; it does not appear in any other religious or philosophical tradition. A complete understanding of //anatta// for and in oneself must be developed before liberation is possible. The Buddha explained this doctrine, so alien to our conventional way of thinking, in many discourses beginning with the second discourse after his Enlightenment.

> "Body ... feeling ... perception, the activities and consciousness (the five aggregates that make up everything there is in a 'being') are not self. If consciousness etc., brethren, were self the consciousness would not be involved in sickness and one could say of consciousness, etc.: 'thus let my consciousness be, thus let my consciousness not be'; but inasmuch as consciousness is not the self, that is why consciousness is involved in sickness. That is why one cannot (so) say of consciousness.
> "Now what think ye brethren. Is body permanent or impermanent?"
>
> "Impermanent, Lord."
>
> "And what is impermanent, is that weal or woe?"
>
> "Woe, Lord."
>
> "Then what is impermanent, woeful, unstable by nature, is it fitting to regard it thus: 'This is mine; I am this; this is the self of me'?"
> "Surely not, Lord."

"... Therefore, brethren, ... every consciousness, etc., what-ever it be, past, future or present, be it inward or outward, gross or subtle, low or high, far or near, -- every consciousness, I say, must be regarded as it really is by right insight: 'this is not mine; this I am not; this is not the self of me.'

"So seeing, brethren, the well-taught Ariyan disciple feels disgust for body, etc. So feeling disgust he is repelled, being repelled he is freed ... so that he knows 'destroyed is rebirth ... done is my task.'"

-- K.S., III, p. 56-60

To develop insight in order to fully comprehend the implications of //anatta// takes a great deal of careful, systematic thought in combination with direct meditative experience. We must try and see that this thing we have habitually for an immeasurably long time called "I" actually has no real existence. This word can only be accurately used as a term of reference for the Five Aggregates -- each of which is constantly changing -- that go to make up this so-called "being." Only by investigating all the Five Khandhas in depth and finding them to be void of any essence or substance at all which might correctly be called one's "self" can we come to fully understand //anatta//.

There are two main ways to come to grips with this doctrine: via //anicca// and via //dukkha//. These two signata are to some extent manifest as apparent truths as well as being ultimate realities, while //anatta// is the complete opposite of the apparent truth. When we think of ourselves and use "I" or "me" or "man" etc., there is the inherent implication that these words refer to some constant, ongoing being. But we have previously seen that if we carefully investigate -- intellectually and by direct observation in vipassana meditation -- all the Five Groups that comprise what we customarily consider "I" and all the physical and mental sense organs that are taken as "mine," that there is no trace of anything even slightly durable in any of them. Ledi Sayadaw explains the relationship between //anicca// and //anatta// by showing how people with untrained minds assume that there is some on-going core or stable essence somewhere in the Five Khandhas (and take this substance to be their //atta//, their self or soul. "Those beings who are not able to discern the momentary arisings and dissolutions of the physical and mental phenomena of the five constituent groups of existence and thus are not able to realize the characteristic of //anicca// maintain: 'the corporeality-group (or sensation, perception, activities or consciousness-group) is the essence and therefore the atta of beings.'" [*] If we wish to take any of these groups as our substance, then we must admit that "I" "decay, die and am reborn every moment"; but such an ephemeral "I" is very far from our usual conception of ourselves. If we have carefully considered //anicca// as it exists in everything internal that could be considered "I," then we must come to the conclusion that this "I" is nothing but a mistaken idea that has grown from inaccurate perception which has been habitually reinforced for a long, long time. As the truth of //anatta// becomes clearer, we gradually let go of this "I" and so are closer and closer to Enlightenment, where not the slightest shadow of a trace of this misconception can remain.

[*] //Manuals of Buddhism//. Ledi Sayadaw. Union of Burma Buddha Sasana Council, Rangoon. '//Samma-Ditthi Dipani//', p. 91.

If we discern all the mental and physical //dukkha// we have to undergo in life, we learn about //anatta// from a different angle. This //nama-rupa// phenomenon is constantly subject to this pain and that anguish, and yet we foolishly insist on calling the body and mind "mine" and assuming that they belong to "me." But the very idea of possession means that the owner has control of the property; so "I" should be able to keep my body and mind as I want them to be, naturally healthy and happy. As the Buddha stated in the quotation at the start of this section, "Let my body be thus; let it not be thus." But obviously and undeniably, suffering is felt and cannot be prevented by mere exertion of will or wishing. So, in reality, we have to come to the conclusion that there is no "I" who controls this //nama-rupa//; mind and body are in no way fit to be called "mine." "The arising of the five constituent groups do not yield to the wishes of anyone." (SDD, p. 93). Phenomena which are dependent upon specific causes which operate strictly according to their nature from moment to moment cannot be subject to control by any "being" and as we explore it thoroughly, we come to understand how this Five Aggregate phenomenon which we wrongly tend to consider "I" is just such a conditioned and dependent process. And suffering (or pleasure, for that matter) likewise comes about because of certain conditions, chief amongst them being //tanha//. There is no "being" who controls what ultimately happens to these five aggregates.

Being caught in personality belief, (//sakkaya ditthi//) -- the inability to comprehend //anatta// -- causes tremendous //dukkha// to creatures on all the planes of existence from the lowest hell to the highest brahma worlds. This great source of suffering must be carefully examined and its workings understood if we are to escape from its powerful, deep-rooted grasp. "Ego-delusion is the foremost of the unwholesome Kamma of old and accompanies beings incessantly. As long as personality belief exists these old unwholesome actions are fiery and full of strength ... those beings who harbor within themselves this personality-belief are continually under pressure to descend or directly fall towards the worlds of woe." [*] (A of A, p. 50). By thoroughly rooting out, seeing through and letting go of this mistaken conception that there is a real substantial "I," "all wrong views, evil mental factors and evil Kammas which would lead ... to the Lower Worlds will disappear." (SDD, p. 87). Thus if we can really know our //Anatta//-nature totally, there is no longer any possibility of the extreme //dukkha// of rebirth in the lower realms of existence and the life continuum will "always remain within the fold of the Buddha's Dispensation wherever ... reborn." (A of A, p. 52). But if one does not understand the impersonal nature of this five aggregate phenomenon, he will "undoubtedly have to preserve his soul (or self) by entertaining evil thoughts and evil actions as the occasion arises." (SDD, p. 50) We can see that if we act on the assumption that there is an "I" we are always in the position of attempting to protect and preserve this 'self' and thus very much prone to commit unwholesome thoughts, words and deeds in relation to other "beings." "People are generally concerned with what they consider to be themselves or their own ... and their bodily, verbal and mental acts are based on and are conditioned by that concern. So the root of all vice for the foolish concern is 'self' and one's 'own.'" Ledi Sayadaw explains how the belief that there is an "I" causes this continual rebirth with a strong downward tendency with the analogy of a string of beads:

> In a string of beads where a great number of beads are strung together by a strong silk thread, if one bead is pulled all the others will follow the one that is pulled. But if the silk thread is cut of removed, pulling one of the beads will not disturb the other beads because there is no longer any attachment between them.
> Similarly, a being that possesses personality-belief harbors a strong attachment to the series of Aggregates arisen during past existences ... and transforms them into an ego ... It is thus that the innumerable unwholesome karmic actions of the past existences which have not yet produced resultants, will accompany that being wherever he may be reborn. These unwholesome actions of the past resemble beads that are strung and bound together by a strong thread.
> Beings, however, who clearly perceive the characteristic of Not-self and have rid themselves of personality-belief, will perceive that the bodily and mental Aggregates that arise and disappear even within the short period of one sitting, do so as separate phenomena and not as a closely interlinked continuum. The concept of 'my self' which is like the thread, is not longer present. Those bodily and mental processes appear to them like the beads from which the thread has been removed."

[*] "The Advantages of Realising the Doctrine of Anatta" by Ledi Sayadaw in //The Three Facts of Existence: III Egolessness//, The Wheel No. 202/204, p. 50. Henceforth: A of A.

Thus the dispelling of personality belief removes all the mental factors which might cause one to behave in such a way that would lead to rebirth in the realms of woe as well as cutting off the link of attachment to an "ego" that has kept us connected to all our evil deeds of the past. Even in this present life it is clear if we think about it that //Sakkaya Ditthi// (personality-belief) causes us great suffering and its elimination would be of great benefit. For example, "When external or internal dangers are encountered or disease and ailments occur, beings attach themselves to them through such thoughts as, 'I feel pain, I feel hurt,' thus take a possessive attitude towards them. This becomes an act of bondage that later may obstruct beings from ridding themselves of those diseases ... though they are so greatly oppressive" (A of A, p. 56).

However, understanding that it is this erroneous personality-belief that keeps us thinking that there is some ongoing essence or substance in this five aggregate phenomena that can rightly be called "I" will not immediately or automatically prevent the thought of "I" from coming up in the mind as it is a very deeply rooted //Sankhara// that has been built up over a long period of time. Whenever a thought related to "I" does appear, we must mindfully apply the wisdom of //anatta// we have already gained and realize that "I" is nothing but an idea originating form an incorrect perception of reality. Whenever we notice ourselves thinking of an "I" as one of the aggregates or as related to one of them, we have to consider carefully the thought and reinforce our understanding that "Whatsoever material object ... whatsoever feeling, whatsoever perception, whatsoever activities, whatsoever consciousness ... (must be rightly regarded as) 'This is not mine, this I am not; this is not the self of me.'" This process of seeing the ignorance arise and repeatedly applying the Right View to it, gradually wears away even the thoughts of "I," "myself" and "mine." This total elimination of "I"-consciousness which is nothing but a subtle form of conceit, and of this concept of "mine" which is subtle form of //tanha//, does not happen until Arhantship is reached. But our task is to deepen the comprehension and investigation of //anatta// to greater and greater depths of insight by means of Vipassana meditation.

A group of monks once questioned the Venerable Khemaka about //anatta// and inquired whether he had attained Arhantship. He replied that he was not yet fully liberated because he still had subtle remnants of "I am" in his mind. He said to them:

> I see that in these five grasping groups I have got the idea of "I am" yet I do not think that I am this "I am." Though (one is a Non-returner) ... yet there remains in him a subtle remnant of the I-conceit, of the I am-desire, of the lurking tendency to think "I am" still not removed from him. Later on he lives contemplating the rise and fall of the five grasping groups seeing thus: "Such is the body, such is the arising of body, such is the ceasing of it. Such is feeling ... perception ... the activities ... consciousness."
> In this way ... the subtle remnant of the I am-conceit, of the I am-desire, that lurking tendency to think "I am" which was still not removed from him -- that is now removed.

This explanation of Khemaka's was so clear and profound that as a direct result of his discourse, all the monks who listened to it and Khemaka himself as well, were fully liberated -- with no remnants of "I am" remaining. So we would do well to carefully study what this wise monk said about the development of //anatta// so that we can come to understand how by means of this process of carefully observing, clearly experiencing, and thoroughly investigating the rise and fall of the five khandhas we gradually eliminate the gross layers of //Sakkaya Ditthi// and by the same means, more and more refined, ultimately root out even the latent, subconscious tendency to think "I am."

Investigation into the Three Universal Characteristics -- //anicca//, //dukkha//, and //anatta// -- is a fundamental requirement for the growth of liberating insight. Once we have thoroughly analyzed our own //nama-rupa// and also the phenomena of the external world, and completely understood how everything we can conceive of -- real or imaginary, mental or physical, internal or external -- is totally unstable, incapable of bringing real durable happiness and without any actual substance, detachment must follow and with it freedom from the //dukkha// of existence. The process of gradually overcoming ignorance with wisdom comes through the direct bodily experience of the unsatisfactoriness and essencelessness of this //nama-rupa// in vipassana meditation, combined with careful thought, so that these "experiences" have their full impact on the mind. Once again, it is by investigation in meditation that detachment from the "all" is won -- and so too the ultimate peace free from all desire.

3. Dependent Origination (//Paticcasamuppada//)

The doctrine of Dependent Origination (Paticcasamuppada) is one of the most profound and far-reaching teachings of the Buddha and as such this law of causality requires very thorough investigation and comprehension by anyone seeking liberation. Without clearly knowing the causal law, the Three Signata and the Four Noble Truths cannot be fully understood with the full insight that leads to dispassion, to Nibbana. All of these are included within //Paticcasamuppada// which demonstrates their relation with each other. The Buddha himself pointed out the great significance of this teaching to Ananda when Ananda said that he found the causal law quite plain. The Buddha admonished him saying, "Say not so, Ananda, say not so! Deep indeed is this causal law, and deep indeed it appears. It is through not knowing, not understanding, not penetrating, that doctrine, that this generation has become entangled like a ball of string ... unable to overpass the doom of the Waste, the Woeful Way, the Downfall, the Constant Faring on." (K.S., II, p.64) And elsewhere Sariputta quotes the Exalted One as saying, " Whoever sees conditional genesis sees the Dhamma, whoever see the Dhamma sees conditioned genesis." (M., I, p. 237)

The general all-encompassing form of the law of Dependent Origination is a very simple statement of cause and effect but is something to which the meditator must give "his mind thoroughly and systematically"; succinctly it states "this being that comes to be; from the arising of this, that arises; from the ceasing of this that ceases." (K.S., II, p.45) This is really just another more abstract formulation of the Second and Third Noble Truths -- the cause of and the cessation of suffering. The full twelve-link formula of the //Paticcasamuppada// is an expansion of these two middle Truths, a full explanation of the process by which suffering is generated and how by the removal of the causes, suffering also comes to cease. Thus in order to understand completely the Four Noble Truths, one must have contemplated on and gained insight into dependent origination as well. Another very important aspect of this doctrine to be understood is how its description of the process of life, the process of becoming, clearly demonstrates how it is totally impersonal manifestation of certain causes, with no "I" or 'being' in any way involved in or related to it, //anatta//. Finally, this doctrine enables us to discern just how kamma operates in generating the causes of rebirth.

The list of twelve links in direct order explaining the arising of suffering, is usually described as beginning with the past life, going on to the present life and then to future life (or potential lives.) //Avijja-paccaya sankhara// -- ignorance conditions mental volitions. It is due to the root cause of ignorance (about the ultimate nature of reality) that the mind generates desires, //sankharas//, kamma. //Sankhara-paccaya vinnanam// -- these mental volitions, this kamma of the past, gives rise to the rebirth-linking consciousness which is the first mind moment of the new (present) birth. Note there is no "thing" transmigrating from one life to another, only a process of cause and effect goes on: //Vinnana-paccaya nama-rupam// -- the mind and matter phenomenon (five aggregates) of the present life come to be due to the existence of this rebirth-linking consciousness. Conception has taken place and this //nama-rupa// phenomenon continues its processes until death intervenes. //Nama-rupa-paccaya salayatanam// -- through mind and matter, the six sense bases are conditioned; with this very start of the new life the five physical sense organs and mind as the sixth come into being. //Salayatana-paccaya phasso// -- throughout the life these six senses are the condition for the arising of contact (with their appropriate objects) which occur from moment to moment.

//Phassa-paccaya vedana// -- feeling (pleasant, unpleasant or neutral) is conditioned by sense impression and this feeling rises in relation to contacts at first through one then another sense door, ad infinitum. //Vedana-paccaya tanha// -- craving arises based on feeling. In terms of practice, this is the most important step of the //Paticcasamuppada// as it is at this point that we can learn to turn around the whole process and make it lead to the cessation of suffering. The other (unnamed) factor which conditions craving along with feeling is ignorance (the same as the first factor) -- the inability to see that in reality there is nothing worth craving for, nothing that can actually be held, and no ongoing being truly capable of having its desires satisfied. At this link volition can alter the old habitual sequences and the feeling part of the mind by means of training in the Noble Eightfold Path can be made to condition the arising of wisdom, and //panna// will forestall the arising of //tanha// (and the whole mass of suffering that is conditioned by this craving). //Tanha-paccaya upadanam// -- craving gives rise to clinging, tenacious desire. Actually, for most of us, the application of wisdom and mindfulness is very rarely such that it can totally prevent the deep habits of //tanha// from surfacing after feeling, but what we can do is prevent either of the next two links -- //upadana// and //bhava// -- from developing out of the initial spurt of desire. //Upadana-paccaya bhavo// -- conditioned by clinging, becoming arises. Due to the power of the accumulation of //sankharas//, of kamma (//tanha//, //upadana// and //bhava being simply mental volitions of increasing strength), the very strong kamma which is responsible for the process of becoming arises and it is these //bhava-sankharas// that generate the momentum for a new birth at the appropriate moment. //Bhava-paccaya jati// -- becoming conditions birth in a future life at the dissolution of this present five aggregate phenomenon. If we seriously consider the matter, we can perceive that all desires are just particular manifestations of the will to exist or to continue; and all such craving and clinging are future directed energies whose function is the seeking of fulfillment. This force of kammic energy does not cease with death. Becoming is just the very strong form of desire and it contains sufficient momentum behind it that at the time of death it is the force that makes for a new birth. This energy manifests and a new //nama-rupa// begins. Thus once again the start of life is shown to be a completely impersonal, conditioned process working totally irrespective of anyone's wishes, hopes or desires, leading to a phenomena with no essence of "I." This link repeats the second one in the series just in different words. //Jati-paccaya jaramaranam// -- once there is birth there automatically comes to be old age and death and all the other manifold forms of suffering encountered in life -- the First Noble Truth. And thus the cycle beginning with our inherited ignorance leads inexorably towards more and more suffering in the future.

The inverse form of the cycle is stated alongside the form above. It is the inverse that demonstrates the Third Noble Truth, how with the cessation of the cause, the effect must cease; so //avijja nirodha, sankhara nirodho// etc., -- when ignorance ceases, no more sankharas are generated and carried through all the intervening links, the way of ending all suffering is thus shown.

This is but a very rough sketch of the workings of the //Paticcasamuppada// that must be wisely considered and thoroughly elaborated on and then incorporated into the meditator's own thought processes for it to serve him as a means to liberation. Each link has to be investigated in terms of the Four Noble Truths -- to understand the factor itself, its arising, its ceasing and the way leading to its cessation (always the Fourth Noble Truth -- the Path). The Buddha has Sariputta explain to him the way the meditator in training who is still a learner, considers things. Sariputta states: "'This has come to be,' Lord -- thus by right insight he sees as it really is; and seeing it in this way he practices revulsion from it, and that it may fade away and cease. From the ceasing of a certain sustenance that which has come to be is liable to cease -- so he sees by right insight as it really is. And seeing that in this way he practices revulsion from that which is liable to cease that it may fade away and cease." The revulsion to be practiced in relation to //all// conditioned phenomena, to all things that have arisen dependent on causes, is closely akin to detachment and dispassion. Unlike aversion, revulsion is based on wisdom and developed in relation to all pleasant, unpleasant or neutral experiences. The Arahant makes the same observations about the unstable nature of conditioned phenomena, but for him the stage of practicing has passed, and when by right insight, the fully liberated one sees "This has come to be," then "because of revulsion at that which has come to be, because of its fading away and ceasing he becomes free, grasping at nothing ...." (K.S., II, p. 36-37) So the lesson to be learned from the Doctrine of Dependent Origination -- as from all the Dhamma -- is that nothing that arises due to causes and conditions can possibly provide secure happiness due to its inherent changeability and instability; so there is absolutely nothing on any plane of existence worth developing the slightest interest in or attachment to as all such involvement can only lead to suffering. So detachment and revulsion are the result of a complete understanding of the workings of the causal law -- and this is liberation.

In one place, the Buddha actually describes the series of causes leading to liberation itself, beginning with suffering, thus: "What is that which is the cause of liberation? Passionlessness is the answer ... and repulsion is causally related to passionlessness ... knowledge-and-vision of things as they really are is causally associated with repulsion ... concentration is causally associated with knowledge-and-vision ... happiness is causally associated with concentration ... serenity is causally associated with happiness ... rapture is causally associated with serenity ... joy is causally associated with rapture ... faith is causally associated with joy ... And what is the cause of faith? Suffering is the answer. Suffering is causally related with faith." (K.S., II, p. 25-26) The Buddha then continues with the origins of suffering back to ignorance following the usual //Paticcasamuppada// formulation backwards, thus showing the whole length of the route -- the Path, the Fourth Noble Truth -- out of the causal cycle. It is because of the experience of suffering that beings seek a way out and put their faith in the Buddha as a guide and in his teachings as the true method to attain freedom from all ill. Thus the causal cycle proceeds from //dukkha//, the end of the usual twelve-link Dependent Origination formula, through //saddha// (faith) and all the steps here named to final and total emancipation.

Kamma is one of the basic causes in the cycle of Dependent Origination (in the past life it goes under name //sankhara// and in the present life it encompasses //tanha//, //upadana//, and //bhava//) and a deep investigation of its significance and operation must be made, as, after all, it is through our own wholesome and unwholesome kamma that we are tied down to the infinite cycle of rebirths and it is by means of good kamma that we are able to transcend this universe of kamma, rebirth and //dukkha//.

It is important to remind ourselves and to discover how in our own minds, at every moment we are creating new kammas. When we investigate the thinking process carefully in our meditation, we come to observe that all our thoughts are related to some //tanha//, some desire or aversion, some volition. And each moment the kamma we are creating is either beneficial or harmful to us both in the immediate and far distant future; there is not an instant when we are molding our future fate. And no matter how good an act of body or speech may seem, it is only a gross manifestation of a mental volition, and if the thought behind it is impure, the kammic effects are in the long run bound to be painful. Hence it is vital to analyze our own minds and then cultivate the beneficial volitions that aid us on the Path to Liberation, otherwise the old habitual tendencies rooted in ignorance are bound to take us to the unhappy realms for rebirth, and once reborn there it is almost impossible to be reborn on the human plane for an extremely long period of time.

But we must also consider that in the ultimate analysis, even good volitions must be given up, as "That which we will, brethren, and that which we intend to do, that wherewithal we are occupied -- this becomes an object for the persistence of consciousness," and so anything we think about will become nourishment for a new birth either in the lower or higher realms, depending on the purity of the willing, the intention or the occupation (K.S., II, p. 45). And ultimately in order to totally eradicate all suffering (even the very subtle //dukkha// that is inherent in the fact that the life span of even the most long-lived Brahma is limited, finite), rebirth must be eliminated -- and this means rooting out its causes as explained in the cycle of Dependent Origination.

Particularly for the Western mind this infinite Samsaric cycle of rebirth has to be thought about quite thoroughly before our understanding of it can influence our behavior, making us act on the basis of a very long-term view. "Incalculable is the beginning, brethren, of this faring on. The earliest point is not revealed of the running on, the faring on of beings cloaked in ignorance, tied to craving ... For many a long day, brethren, have ye experienced death of mother, of son, of daughter, have ye experienced the ruin of kinfolk, the calamity of disease. Greater is the flood of tears shed by you crying and weeping of one and all these as ye fare on, run on this many a long day, united with the undesirable, sundered from the desirable, than are the waters in the four seas. (Because) incalculable is the beginning, brethren, of this faring on." (K.S., II, p. 120)

Ledi Sayadaw reminds us that, "Lack of wholesome kamma will lead to the lower worlds where one has to suffer grievously. Fearing such suffering, one has to perform wholesome kamma which can lead one to be reborn as man or deva in the existences to come." (//Manuals of Buddhism//, p. 227, Magganga Dipani). One important aspect of Right View which as to be investigated relates to kamma. We have to know for ourselves that "Only the wholesome and unwholesome actions of beings are the origin of their wanderings in many a becoming or world cycle"; and that only these actions "are their real refuge wherever they may wander" (Magganga Dipani, p. 221). There is nothing very strange in this idea of kamma being the one thing that endures (while always being influenced and altered by present mental volitions), carrying over from one life to the next. If we ponder over the matter, we see that just as a moral cause and effect works within this life to only some extent, the effects of many kammas can only show up in future lives; so over an infinite span of lives //kusala// (wholesome) kammas ultimately must bring good results and //akusala// (unwholesome) kammas bring unhappy states. As we study the cycle of Dependent Origination it clearly shows that there is no entity or ongoing being involved anywhere in all these births, deaths and rebirths, but only past kamma manifesting in a five aggregate phenomenon which changes every moment and which in turn continues to generate new kamma leading to new births, in a process that evolves endlessly from moment to moment.

As seen above, it is of vital importance to investigate thoroughly the causal law and kamma in order for full insight into the nature of existence to develop, for some causes lie behind the arising of absolutely everything. "Whether any ... mental or physical phenomena arises, the arising of any thing whatsoever is dependent on conditions, and without condition, nothing can ever arise or enter into existence." [*] It is only through giving systematic thought to the twelve factors and the connections between them in the //Paticcasamuppada// cycle that we can introduce the appropriate causes to make this law cease operating. And only thus can we bring to an end the process of rebirth and its attendant suffering, by substituting wisdom for ignorance when feeling arises -- and so prevent the development of //tanha// which would inexorably lead to rebirth. Most important of all to train the mind in wisdom is to understand clearly how completely impersonally and automatically moment to moment every link in the cycle operates; the sequence goes on strictly as a matter of cause and effect with no room for, no need for, any "I" to explain the continual rise and fall of //nama-rupa//.

[*] //Buddhist Dictionary, Manual of Buddhist Terms and Doctrines// Nyanatiloka. Buddhist Publication Society, Kandy. p. 135.

> In this religion, brethren, a pondering brother ponders: 'This diverse and manifold ill that arises in the world as old age and death -- what is this ill based on, how comes it to pass? ... What being there does old age-and-death come to be? What not being there does old age-and-death not come to be?' He pondering comes to know that this ... is based on birth ... He comes to know old age-and-death, he comes to know its arising, he comes to know its ceasing and he comes to know the way going to its ceasing.
> -- K.S., II, p. 56-57

He ponders similarly on all the other factors in the Dependent Origination and thus he is called a "brother who has wholly practiced for the complete destroying of ill." Full comprehension through very careful analysis of the //Paticcasamuppada// must make us detached, must make us see that there is nothing which really corresponds to the word "I," and must make us learn to cease creating sankharas by willing actions. Once we cease to create any more kamma of any kind, the other links in the cycle must automatically fall away. And the Buddha ends this discourse emphatically referring to this process of breaking the causal chain saying, "Believe me, brethren, be convinced of this, be ye without doubt herein, without hesitation just this is the end of Dukkha!"

4. The Five Aggregates (//khandha//)

//Dhammavicaya// in addition to the definition used in the previous three sections of investigation of the Dhamma, may also be interpreted as meaning investigation of dhammas, of all things, all phenomena, mental or physical, real or imaginary, conditioned or unconditioned. In this connection the most important things to be examined are perhaps, first the five khandhas or aggregates that make one life continuum, one //nama-rupa//, a "person": and second the six sense doors -- five physical ones and the mind, and their corresponding six categories of sense objects.

We have to examine the aggregate of body and four of the mind -- perception, feeling, mental volitions and consciousness -- that in combination make up this thing we have been calling "I," very thoroughly and deeply in order to see how ultimately there is nothing lasting, satisfying or which deserves to be considered "myself" in any of them; to know how all that we associate with "me" is just //anicca//, //dukkha// and //anatta//, and to understand how these aggregates arise to pass away. The khandhas are the basic components which make up what we perceive of as an individual. But each of these aggregates in itself has no essence; each is merely a process of continual minute momentary risings and fallings.

//Vinnana// is consciousness, just the process or faculty of knowing, or awareness, that arises immediately upon the coming together of any sense organ and its respective object. //Sanna// is perception or recognition of the object, defining it by associating it with past memories. //Vedana// is the feeling that arises as an immediate result of contact when the internal and external sense bases get together and the appropriate consciousness comes into being. //Vedana// can be pleasant, unpleasant or neutral feeling of body or of mind. //Sankhara// is mental volitions or activities; the thinking process of the mind is the facet of //nama// governed by this khandha. The past mind-moment with its consciousness, feeling, perception and volition is the condition for the arising of the next, but there is nothing of any of those four mental components (nor anything outside of them) that continues over from one instant to the next. The body aggregate, too, is utterly impermanent and insubstantial, just like any form of matter, living or inorganic. All matter is made up of the infinitely small //kalapas// (sub-atomic particles or vibrations) which come to be and vanish at only a slightly slower rate than the mind, but still so extremely quickly that we get the illusion of continuity, unity and substance where these do not actually exist.

The Buddha tells the monks the importance of such examination of the aggregates thus: "So soon, brethren, as beings thoroughly understand, as they really are the satisfaction as such, the misery as such, the way of escape as such in these five factors of grasping (the aggregates) then, brethren, beings do remain aloof, detached ... with barriers of the mind done away with." (K.S., III, p. 30) Once we intellectually realize that none of the khandhas can rightly be called "mine," then we are faced with the urgent task of rooting out, eliminating this aspect of personality belief from our minds, of becoming truly aloof and detached. The Buddha described this work thus: "What is not of you, brethren, put it away. Putting it away will be for your profit and welfare. And what, brethren, is not of you? Body ... feeling ... perception ... the activities, consciousness is not of you. Put it away." (K.S., III, p. 231-2). Putting away or giving up or letting go of what we incorrectly think of as "mine" is a gradual and long term process. In fact, not only is this process of investigating and giving systematic attention to the //anicca//, //dukkha//, //anatta// nature of the aggregates the work of the beginner, the same thing is done by beings at any stage along the way, even by the fully-liberated ones. "The grasping groups, friend Kotthita," says the great disciple of the Buddha, Sariputta, "are the conditions which should be pondered with method by a virtuous brother, as being impermanent, sick, as a boil, as a dart, as pain, as ill-health, as alien, as transitory, empty and soulless ... It is possible for a virtuous brother so pondering with method ... to realize the fruits of stream winning ... of once returning ... of never returning ... of arahantship ... For the Arahant, friend, there is nothing further to be done ... Nevertheless, these things, if practiced and enlarged conduce to a happy existence and self-possession even in this present life" for him. (K.S., III, p. 143)

Very frequently the Buddha refers to the five aggregates or groups of existence as the //upadanakkhandha// or grasped-at groups, aggregates (as objects) of clinging, etc. It is worthwhile to contemplate why he considered these components of life so inseparable from //tanha// and //upadana// that he actually called them clinging-aggregates. First of all, these aggregates only come into being because of //tanha//; through craving and clinging the past sankharas gave rise to the present birth, the current //namarupa// which is precisely the same as these five grasped-at groups. What has its cause in clinging must have clinging as its very core. Secondly, these aggregates are the means by which we are //conscious// of and //perceive// through the six sense doors; an impression is then //felt// and as a result of this process the input leads to mental //volitions// as well as to actions of //body// directed by some //tanha// to gain, grasp at, cling to something. Thirdly, and most important, it is just these five constituent groups that we tend to cling to most tenaciously, convinced that they are "I" and "mine." We have already looked into this misperception of reality and by means of a strong simile the Buddha illustrated the danger in such clinging to any of the aggregates or seeing in them any security:

> Suppose ... a mountain torrent ... rising from afar, swift-flowing, and on both its banks are growing grasses overhanging the stream; ... and a man is swept away by that stream and clutches at the grasses, but they might break away and owing to that he might come by his destruction.

Even so, brethren, the untaught manyfolk ... regard the body as the self, or the self as having body, or the body as being in the self, or the self as being in the body. Then the body breaks away, and owing to that they come by their destruction.

And so with feeling, perception, the activities ... consciousness.

We also subject ourselves to tremendous suffering because we "are possessed by this idea" that the body belongs to "me" for, when the body or any of the aggregates "alters and changes, owing to the unstable nature of the body, then sorrow and grief, woe, lamentation and despair arise" if these changes are not what we wanted (K.S., III, p. 3).

Only by completely investigating the ultimate reality of these five aggregates will we see that they are incapable of giving satisfaction and so not worth grasping at, that actually they are so unstable that holding onto them is impossible, and there is no one who can cling anyhow (as the 'self' arises and vanishes every moment and so cannot possibly continue to possess anything for any period of time). So, in order to attain liberation, one must attain insight into these five aggregates so that the necessary dispassion arises, for "by not thoroughly knowing, by not understanding, by not being detached from, by not renouncing body (and the other khandhas) one is unfit for the destruction of suffering ... But, brethren, by thoroughly knowing (them) ... one is fit for the destruction of suffering" (K.S., III, p. 26).

5. The Sense Bases

(//Ayatana//)

The investigative process also must be applied to the internal and external sense bases (//ayatana//), so that the pleasure and misery in them, their cause and cessation, and their //anicca//, //dukkha// and //anatta// nature is fully comprehended. Only with this insight are we able to let go of our attachments to, desire for, and clinging to, the eye and visible objects, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and things tangible, the mind and mental objects. One must especially learn how the mind operates as just another sense organ, whose field is all the perceptions and thoughts that have occurred in the past, in order to dissociate the workings of the mind from the "I" notion. In his third sermon, the Buddha stated, "The all is on fire" and the nature of this conflagration must be seen and understood before it can be extinguished and freedom gained from it. "The eye, brethren, is on fire, objects are on fire, eye-consciousness ... eye contact ... that weal or woe or neutral state experienced, which arises owing to eye-contact (//vedana//, feeling); ... that also is on fire ... On fire with the blaze of lust, the blaze of ill-will, the blaze of infatuation, the blaze of birth, decay and death, sorrow ... ," (K.S., IV, p. 10) and so are tongue and mind-related phenomena -- and by extrapolation those coming from the other senses as well.

The six internal sense organs (//salayatana//) and their corresponding objects have a crucial role in the present lifetime phase of the //Paticcasamuppada//. Consciousness, //vinnana//, is not permanent or abiding; instead it arises and ceases every moment, and it is the coming together of one of the sense organs and its respective object that causes the arising of a moment of consciousness. Thus every consciousness is eye-consciousness, or ear-consciousness, or nose- or tongue- or body- or mind-consciousness, depending on which sense organ at that instant has met its object. The cycle of causality continues on from there: "Owing to eye and objects arises eye-consciousness. The coming together of the three is contact. Dependent on contact is feeling. Dependent on feeling is craving ...

grasping ... becoming. Dependent on becoming is rebirth, decay and death, sorrow and grief ... This is the arising of the world." (K.S., IV, p. 53) From thus analyzing the genesis of existence (the "world") and of //dukkha// (as it is more often formulated) we can understand the absolutely impersonal nature of the arising of consciousness, as well as the germinal role in creating sankharas played by the internal and external sense bases.

Consciousness, or mind, is analogous to the proverbial monkey constantly on the move high up in the trees in the jungle, always grasping at something or the other. Similarly with the mind, at each and every mind-moment when awake, consciousness must be connected with one or another of the sense doors; there is no underlying substratum of consciousness that endures through time, but only momentary clutching after sights, grabbing for sounds, clinging to smells, holding on to tastes, attachment to tangibles or (and often most predominantly) hanging onto mind objects. It is because the sense organs and their objects inherently contain the danger of tempting us to create craving (//tanha//) and an urge to renewed existence (//bhava-sankhara//) that the Buddha frequently warned the monks about keeping the sense doors well guarded, since the external objects cannot be eliminated. By means of ongoing mindfulness, rooted in insight into the true nature of all the phenomena that appear at the sense doors, it is necessary to observe how craving starts to rear its head (as it inevitably will, due to the old completely automatic mental conditioning) once contact and feeling have taken place, and not allow the desire to take over the mind and becomes a strong rebirth producing force. If we do not keep watch over our senses and reactions attentively, we are like the fish attracted by the well-baited hook on the line held by the fisherman. "Just as a fisherman, brethren, casts a baited hook in some deep pool of water, and some fish greedy for the bait, gulps it down and thus ... comes to destruction, -- even so, brethren, there are these six hooks in the world, to the sorrow of beings ... objects cognizable by the eye inciting to lust ... If a brother delights therein, persists in clinging to them, such a one is called 'hook-swallower' ... is come to destruction." (K.S., IV, p. 99) And of course the other hooks to be wary of in the world are alluring sounds, smells, tastes, tangibles and mental objects. If we give careful, systematic attention to these external sense objects as we meet them, we cannot help but realize that the pain of swallowing the hooks by clinging to the sense objects far outweighs the possible momentary pleasure of tasting the bait.

The basic aim of investigating the sense organs is the same as for the aggregates -- to see how thoroughly they are //anicca// and // Dukkha// and so to cease to cling to them as "I" and "mine." "A brother beholds no trace of the self nor what pertains to the self in the six-fold sense sphere. so beholding, he is attached to nothing in the world. Unattached he is not troubled. Untroubled he is of himself utterly set free" (K.S., IV, p. 104).

The specific subjects in the Dhamma that must be investigated for insight have in this section been given initial exploration. The task is to turn these thoughts and ideas into real wisdom, so that the whole course of the life becomes oriented to and aimed at liberation. We must learn to keep before us at all the time the ultimate nature of all dhammas -- all phenomena of any conceivable kind that can enter consciousness -- so that the gross perceptual illusion or hallucination of the apparent truth loses its strength and the ignorance it fosters vanishes and with it all craving. We have to analyze completely this body-and-mind and all the external phenomena that appear from time to time at the six sense doors until the pleasure and misery in them are understood, until the causes of their arising and ceasing are comprehended, until their ultimately impermanent, unsatisfactory, conditioned and essenceless nature is clearly known. This is done by means of careful investigation in meditation of the Three Signata of Existence, and the Doctrine of Dependent Origination. With this insight fully developed there can be no clinging or craving, no ill-will or aversion, and ultimately one becomes "independent, unattached to anything in the world," and so with all its causes uprooted, liberation from all suffering is achieved.

Investigation in Meditation

There are a number of other aspects of Dhamma Investigation that have to be examined now that the contents of such exploration have been discussed. The very basic and essential relationship between investigative thinking and insight meditation, how the two are required to support each other and send the meditator's mind to its goal of ending all possibility of dukkha, is the appropriate one to deal with first.

For investigation of Dhamma to lead to liberating insight it must be combined with and done in the course of insight meditation. It is just through investigation and wise consideration of phenomena that insight into their ultimate nature develops. At the time of the Buddha there were people who became fully Enlightened in just a few moments of time, but even for them some sort of thought process had to go on. But these individuals had accumulated such a vast store of //paramis// -- accumulated good acts and mental dispositions of the past -- that the liberating wisdom came with nearly instantaneous impact. While just a Bodhisatta, the Buddha went back to the first jhana, a deep absorption (after having mastered seven still deeper, more profound concentrative states) -- which includes thinking -- when he sat under the Bodhi Tree with the final and total determination to become fully liberated. "Before my enlightenment, while I was still only an unenlightened Bodhisatta, I thought: This world has fallen into a slough for it is born, ages and dies, it passes away and reappears, and yet knows no escape from this suffering. When will an escape from this suffering be described? I thought: what is there when aging and death come to be? What is their necessary condition? Then with ordered attention I came to understand ... birth is a necessary condition for them." And so as he exerted the utmost effort to become a Buddha, a fully self-liberated being, he proceeded carefully thinking through all the links of the cycle of Dependent Origination in both directions. "I thought: This is the path to enlightenment that I have now reached ... that is how there is a cessation to this whole aggregate mass of suffering. 'The cessation, the cessation' such was the insight, the knowledge, the understanding, the vision, the light, that arose in me about ideas no heard of before." [*]

[*] "The Life of the Buddha," Nanamoli, Buddhist Publication Society, pp. 25, 27 quoting from //Samyutta Nikaya, XII, 65.

Also to gain the full understanding of the khandhas at this crucial juncture of this life, the Bodhisatta used careful intellectual consideration. "I thought: in the case of material form, of feeling, of perception, of formations, of consciousness what is the gratification, what is the danger, what the escape? Then I thought: In the case of each the bodily pleasure and mental joy that arise in dependence on these things (the five categories) are the gratification; the fact that these things are all impermanent, painful and subject to change is the danger; the disciplining and abandoning of desire and lust for them is the escape." [*]

[*] //Ibid//. p. 28

These quotations show how vital wise investigative thinking was to the Buddha himself in his meditations while moving towards his Enlightenment and so must we, too, carefully combine the thought process and meditation to liberate ourselves from suffering.

The long quotation given in the section on investigating the khandhas shows how it is the process of pondering deeply on things that brings us dispassion towards them all, and so to the stages of Enlightenment. So insight, clarity of vision into the ultimate nature of reality, //bhavana-maya-panna//, (wisdom born of meditation) the personal direct knowledge that bears concrete fruit in our behavior in life, is really based on careful thinking so that the apparent truths are seen through and no longer allowed to delude us by coloring and covering up the real nature of our minds and bodies and of the external world.

This liberating insight can, however, only develop if the investigating is done by a person who meditates regularly. Meditation provides us with the relatively concrete evidence of personal experience to guarantee the validity of our more abstract thinking. There are times when meditation consists of just observing, in a very one-pointed manner, the rise and fall of the sensations (//vedana//) caused by the subtle biochemical changes going on in the body. But there are other occasions either when thinking is going on quite strongly or when there is a tendency to sloth and torpor, and at these times it is very beneficial to do Dhamma investigation. When the mind is busy thinking, it is always involved in ignorance, always full of clinging or aversion, always dwelling in the past or future because this is the nature of the conditioning that it has gotten from the past. By this kind of thinking we are creating "heaps and heaps" of unwholesome mental volitions, //sankharas//, //akusala kamma//, which are bound to bear fruit in some sort of //dukkha// in the future. If instead we apply the mind in a systematic way to thinking about Dhamma, trying to eliminate craving, trying to see through to the ultimate realities of phenomena, we are creating very powerful good kamma for ourselves which has to lead us toward liberation. At the same time, this kind of consideration clarifies in our minds the fundamental truths of Buddha Dhamma that we have read or heard previously so that they become fully comprehensible and meaningful. Thus carefully directed thought, while sitting in vipassana meditation, is a vital tool for the rooting out of all our ignorance and for contrasting the path to emancipation.

Also investigation is important to practice strenuously when there is a tendency to a daydreaming, lazy kind of meditation, when the hindrances of sloth and torpor are attacking. The Buddha told the monks, "... at such time, monks, as the mind is sluggish, then is the season for cultivating the limb of wisdom that is Norm-investigation, the season for cultivating the limb of wisdom that is energy, the season for cultivating the limb of wisdom that is zest. Why so? Because, monks, the sluggish mind is easily raised up by such conditions." (K.S., V, p. 96) By energetically applying the mind to trying to understand more thoroughly than before the Four Noble Truths or another important aspect of Dhamma, the mind will be directed and stimulated. When this happens, the tendency of the mind to drift must disappear and zest for meditation and the clarity of mind which is crucial to real understanding return.

Thus to use investigation in meditation is to apply Right Thought, one of the factors of the Noble Eightfold Path. Obviously, analytical thinking takes places in relation to Dhamma outside of meditation as well -- when listening to discourses or when doing Dhamma reading, for example. But for the information gained from outside to become truly meaningful to us, for it to become our own "wisdom-born-of-meditation" (//bhavana-maya-panna//), for this information to influence how we live our lives, it must be thoroughly thought through while we are actually sitting in meditation. At such times the mind is much more concentrated and subtle than usual and as the hindrances to concentration and insight (i.e.: doubt, excitement and restlessness, sloth and torpor, greed, and ill-will) are at a fairly low level, the mind is much more pliable and fit to assimilate pure Dhamma thoughts. As we increase our understanding and wisdom through meditative investigation, we decrease our ignorance, and as ignorance diminishes we are loosening the bondage of our suffering and becoming more and more free of craving (//tanha//).

Systematic Attention and Control of the Hindrances

Another important role played by investigation is in preventing the arising of all the hindrances that tend to block our progress now and again. It is by means of analytical thought, systematic attention, //yoniso-manasikara//, that we can keep the hindrances under control. In this process the two Enlightenment Factors of investigation and mindfulness are employed, as it takes careful thought in combination with continuous awareness to keep control of the mind. "And what, monks, is no food for the arising of sensual lust not yet arisen?" The Buddha answers his own question saying that sensual lust is kept from growing by "systematic attention" to "the repulsive feature of things." To counter the hindrance of ill will, systematic attention must be given to metta, the quality of unbounded loving kindness. To deal with sloth and torpor, systematic attention must be applied to "the element of putting forth effort, the element of exertion, the element of striving." Against excitement, one must apply systematic attention to tranquility of mind. To still doubt, one must give systematic attention to Dhamma, or in the Buddha's words, to "things good and things bad, things blameworthy and things not blameworthy, things mean and things exalted, things that are constituent parts of darkness and light" (K.S. V, p. 88).

These five great hindrances to concentration, to meditation, to living the Dhamma life are all quite familiar habits to us. But we can develop the tools to prevent their arising and to control them when they do come up. And chief amongst these is the application of systematic attention to the external situations that stimulate the sensual lust, the ill will, the sloth and torpor, the excitement and the doubt that lie latent in our minds, and to the internal negative tendencies themselves. Thus when it is seen that with wisdom these inappropriate deep-rooted, habitual mental reactions to impermanent, unsatisfactory and essenceless phenomena, the hindrances must lose strength and gradually disappear, leaving behind a pure mind.

Investigation Conduces to Insight

Investigation of Dhamma is one of the four factors which the Buddha frequently describes as conducing "to growth in wisdom, to acquiring insight, to growth of insight, the increase of insight." The four elements involved are: "Association with good men (following after the good), hearing //Saddhamma// (the Good Norm), thorough work of mind (systematic attention to Dhamma), and behavior in accordance with Dhamma (living in accordance with the precepts of the Norm)." When the Buddha spoke, of course, the good man to associate oneself with was specifically the Tathagata himself and his Arahant disciples, all fully liberated beings. Today we do not have this opportunity, but we certainly can choose our associates from amongst those who are on the Path and who are striving to gain wisdom. If we associate with the foolish, we are wasting our time and tempting ourselves unnecessarily, making our task of self-purification all the more difficult. But if we spend time with other strivers, we will reinforce our own motivation and also perhaps get some direct help or encouragement in times of need. As for the second factor, only rarely do we get the opportunity to actually "hear" the Dhamma and then of course not directly from the Fully Enlightened One. But when we take a meditation course, this purpose is served by the teacher's discourses which are designed to inform us of and elucidate to us the fundamentals of the Dhamma. Naturally this opportunity, too, is limited, and to supplement live Dhamma teachings regularly, we have to do some reading both of the direct words of the Buddha as preserved in the translated Pali texts, and also of what later meditators have written about him and his teachings. Without this beneficial material for our minds to thoroughly think about, to consider wisely, to give systematic attention to, we are apt to find our meditation getting into ruts which become so habitual as to lose their impact on our minds -- and on how we live our lives as well. On the other hand, reading Dhamma as an intellectual pastime without combining it with meditation and trying to make what we read our own wisdom which can influence our life patterns, is a complete waste of time. But if we are associating with a Sangha (the community of those walking on the Noble Eightfold Path), if we are learning the basics of Dhamma and carefully and persistently applying our minds to it, then our behavior cannot help but reflect the wisdom we are so gaining. Thus these four factors must "if cultivated and made much of, conduce to realising the fruits of stream-winning ... of once-returning, of non-returning and of Arahantship" (K.S. V, p. 351).

The Seven Factors of Enlightenment

Investigation of Dhamma, //dhammavicaya//, usually the second in the list of the seven Factors of Enlightenment, has a unique place amongst these limbs of wisdom whose function is to purify and train the mind and to "conduce to downright revulsion, to dispassion, to cessation, to calm, to full comprehension, to wisdom, to Nibbana." (K.S., V, p. 69) Thinking over the Buddha's teachings is the very basis for the development of these seven factors, as described in the following quotation:

> When a monk ... remembers and turns over in his mind that teaching of the Norm, it is then that the limb of wisdom which is mindfulness is established in that monk; ... Thus, he, dwelling mindful, with full recognition investigates and applies insight to that teaching of the Norm and comes to close scrutiny of it.
> Now, monks, at such a time as a monk, dwelling thus mindful, with full recognition investigates and applies insight to that teaching of the Norm, then it is that limb of wisdom which is Norm-investigation that, as he comes to close scrutiny of it, by his culture of it, it comes to perfection.
> -- K.S., V, p. 55

Clearly, from the Buddha's description of the cultivation of the two limbs of wisdom of mindfulness and investigation, they are closely tied up with each other; certainly neither can be perfected without the help of the other. But thinking about the Norm is the most basic feature involved in the development of these seven Bojjhangas because it is the original motivator behind their development. That is why the Buddha placed it at the very beginning of his description of the seven as well as in its regular spot as the second factor, //dhammavicaya//.

Mindfulness is a vital skill to develop, for without mindfully observing one's mind and body to see the defilements as they tend to creep in, it is impossible to purify oneself. But without some degree of understanding of the ultimate facts of existence (//anicca//, //dukkha// and //anatta// and the relationship between //tanha// and //dukkha// particularly), the practice of "bare attention" (//sati//) would probably be futile. Just watching what is going on at the gross level of bodily action is unlikely in and of itself to take us to that deep insight that automatically begins to rid our minds of greed, hatred and delusion, the roots of //tanha// and hence of //dukkha//. Only if our minds are also carefully at work to try and delve into the ultimate realities is mindfulness, constant watchfulness, guaranteed to bear fruit. The Buddha describes this when he defines "the cultivation of a station of mindfulness. Herein a monk dwells contemplating the rise of things in body. He so dwells contemplating the fall of things in body, ... and also in feeling, mind and mind-states." (K.S. V, p. 160) In other words, it is by the consideration of the //anicca// (and by extrapolation, the //dukkha// and //anatta// nature as well) of the body, the feelings, the mind and the mind-states that mindfulness is actually developed.

On the other hand, investigation alone also tends to be sterile, a merely intellectual knowledge. Only by continuing meditative mindfulness and observation of whatever comes into the mind via any of the six sense doors, can we put into practice our understanding of Dhamma. The Pali phrase "//yoniso manasikara//" combines the two factors of mindfulness and investigation in itself, although the stress seems to be on the latter. //Yoniso manasikara// is translated as systematic attention or wise consideration. Systematically, mindfully, with full awareness, one considers the Dhamma; one thinks about the matter at hand until its apparent nature has been penetrated and the ultimate truth is clear. Once the wisdom is gained and the mindfulness of the ultimate reality of the body, feelings, mind and mental states (the Four Stations of Mindfulness) is constant, then it is only a matter of effort, of energy (the third Enlightenment Factor) of just patiently and persistently doing the work -- the results of these conditions (detachment leading to liberation) must come about automatically.

This energy is the Enlightenment Factor which follows //dhammavicaya//. "As with full recognition he investigates and applies insight to that Norm-teaching, then unshaken energy is established in him" (K.S., V, p. 56). On the basis of understanding the utter suffering of existence we become so convinced of the need to escape from the perpetual rounds of Samsara, that we are completely willing to put out all the effort needed to do so. Knowing that we are doing what has to be done brings us //piti//, the next limb of wisdom. //Piti// is pure joy or pleasurable interest or zest -- it is the positive feeling that arises from knowing we have the technique for eliminating our suffering which sustains us further, encouraging us to continue to apply that method wholeheartedly. Tranquillity of mind and body, the next limb, develops, with //piti//; with the elimination of doubt a deep sense of peace of mind based on wisdom comes about. When one has thought about life very carefully and knows that there is nothing in the world worth getting the least bit involved with or attached to, then the mind runs after objects less and less and tends to settle down and get well concentrated (the sixth factor), as no possible phenomena at any of the six sense doors appear worthwhile for it to try and grasp onto. This pure concentration as it is rooted in insight and allows insight to grow more and more, makes the mind balanced and calm, and so equanimity (the final limb of wisdom) grows. This is not bored, mundane callousness, but an equanimity that is rooted in clear thought and deep understanding which has made it apparent that there can be absolutely nothing, mental or physical, anywhere on any plane of existence, past, present or future, worth reacting to or getting involved with.

Thus it is that the Buddha declared, "As a matter concerning one's own self, monks, I see no other single factor so potent for the arising of the seven limbs of wisdom as systematic attention. Of a monk who is possessed of systematic attention we may expect that he will cultivate, that he will make much of the seven limbs of wisdom," and developing these seven Enlightenment Factors is precisely developing liberation from suffering (K.S., V, pp. 84-5). Hence, careful investigation, persistently pursued is the root cause of, as well as the route to, wisdom in all its facets.

The Noble Eightfold Path

The Buddha states that it is this same factor of systematic attention (//yoniso manasikara//) that brings one onto the Noble Eightfold Path, the Fourth Noble Truth, which leads to the cessation of all suffering.

> Just as the dawn, monks, is the forerunner, the harbinger of the sun, even so possession of systematic thought, monks, is, the forerunner, the harbinger, of the arising of the Ariyan Eightfold Way.
> Of a monk who is possessed of systematic thought, it may be expected that he will cultivate, that he will make much of the Ariyan Eightfold Way. And how monks, does a monk so possessed make much of the Ariyan Eightfold Way?
> Herein a monk cultivates right view, that is based on seclusion, that is based on dispassion, on cessation, that ends in self-surrender, and he makes much of it ... He cultivates right aim (thought), right speech, right action, right living (livelihood), right effort, right mindfulness, he cultivates and makes much of right concentration that is based on seclusion, on dispassion, on cessation, that ends in self-surrender.
> -- K.S., V, p. 27)

The Noble Eightfold Path is divided into three sections: the first is //Panna// (wisdom) and includes the first two factors of //samma-ditthi// (Right View or Understanding) and //samma-sankappa// (Right Thought); second is //sila// (morality) which includes //samma-vaca// (Right Speech), //samma-kammanta// (Right Action) and //samma-ajiva// (Right Livelihood); the third division is //samadhi// (concentration) including the final three elements of the Path -- //samma-vayama// (Right Effort), //samma-sati// (Right Mindfulness) and //samma-samadhi// (Right Concentration). Investigation is important to each group. Although it is virtually identical with the //panna// section of the Path, the faculty of reasoned contemplation has significant role to play in the development of both //sila// and //samadhi//, and //samadhi// and //sila// in turn both support investigation.

Careful investigation of the apparent truth must enable to break through the barriers of our conditioned, colored and unclear perception of things until we thoroughly penetrate and clearly comprehend their ultimate truth. This is vipassana -- insight; this is //panna// -- Right Understanding and Right Thought, wisdom. As the Buddha shows us in a simile, all perception is as unsubstantial and essenceless as a mirage. "Just as if, brethren, in the last month of the dry season at high noontide there should be a mirage and a keen-sighted man should observe it and look close into the nature of it, so observing it he would find it to be without essence." (K.S., III, p. 119) If we accept the information we get about the world both internal and external from our sense organs automatically without carefully examining it, we are bound to act on the basis of the mirage of ignorance as all the past thinking that influences the perception -- and so the feeling and reaction which come along with it -- was based on the inaccurate assumptions of permanence, beauty, happiness and self. But once we begin to develop Right View, we come to see gradually how in actual fact nothing lasts, nothing can really be called beautiful (since everything is always changing, undergoing corruption and decay), nothing can really bring us satisfaction and there is no essence in any of the apparently solid objects, beings or mental phenomena of the universe. And we come to understand that there can only be the conditioned processes of becoming that arise and cease strictly and solely in accordance with the appropriate conditions.

Right Thought is a vital means to the attainment of this Right Understanding or View; and investigation of truth is one and the same with Right Thought.

"Whatsoever there is of thinking, considering, reasoning, thought, ratiocination, application ... the mind being holy, being turned away from the world, and conjoined with the path, the holy path being pursued" is called Right Thought (Majjhima Nikaya, 117) [see errata]. Right Thought is also specifically, and on the more mundane level, thinking that is free from ill-will or cruelty and thinking relating to renunciation of greed and lust. Right Understanding grows deeper and deeper the more thoroughly we investigate the essentials of Buddha Dhamma. As we apply our minds to them, the Three Salient Characteristics of Existence, the nature of wholesome and unwholesome Kamma, the Doctrine of Dependent Origination and the Four Noble Truths all become more meaningful to us and we comprehend more clearly how they explain the phenomena of existence and the way out of all suffering. "He understands what is worthy of consideration ... He considers the worthy ... What suffering is he wisely considers; what the extinction of suffering is he wisely considers, what the path that leads to the extinction of suffering is, he wisely considers." (Majjhima Nikaya, 2) And thus wisely considering, we come to act on the basis of such thought; with such purified deeds of body, speech and mind we are bringing ourselves nearer and nearer to the cessation of all suffering.

//Sila// is morality; in the context of the Noble Eightfold Path it refers specifically to Right Speech, Action and Mode of Livelihood. However, there are many broader kinds of //sila// -- from the Five Precepts every lay disciple tries to live by to the 227 rules for monks. The culmination of //sila// is the culmination of the Path -- perfect purity of bodily and verbal action rooted in similarly cleansed mental volition; when the mind can no longer develop //tanha// for any object whatsoever, then it is completely pure and totally free from all suffering. We may keep the //sila// precepts rather mechanically, by tradition, or automatically reciting the Five Precepts at the start of a meditation course and this may for a time seem to serve our purpose. But if such morality is not based on Right Understanding, it will be very weak when put under duress by adverse conditions. Unless we have thought through and understood the drastic kammic results, in future lives as well as in this one, that we must expect from breaking //sila//, we may well be tempted to lie for our own gain, to earn our livelihood by some means involving subterfuge or dishonesty, or to take something that actually belongs to someone else. An understanding of the fact that "Only the wholesome and unwholesome volitional actions (//kamma//) done by beings are their own properties that always accompany them, wherever they may wander in many a becoming," (//Subha-sutta// quoted in Ledi Sayadaw, //Manuals of Buddhism// p. 75, //Samma-ditthi Dipani//) will greatly strengthen one's resolve to abstain from doing unwholesome deeds, of body, speech and most importantly mind. Clearly understanding the Path and how //sila// relates to the other sections is also a great support for keeping the moral code. //Sila// makes up the preliminary steps in self-purification. If we indulge in intoxicants or sexual misconduct (e.g., adultery) or break the other three precepts, we cannot hope to gain concentration or wisdom. This is because it is the nature of such behavior that it keeps the mind distracted, either over-excited or very dull. But if we keep our morality pure on this gross level of bodily and verbal actions, then we are able to undertake the task of mental concentration and purification which is the work of //samadhi// and //panna//. Right View and Understanding, roots out the causes of all our unwholesome mental volitions. With ignorance thus eliminated, free from //tanha//-related thoughts, we automatically keep perfect //sila// of body and speech. Working on these principles of Dhamma in our minds so that we really comprehend both the results of our immoral actions and the importance of keeping //sila// as the basis for progress on the Path will make our //sila// much stronger and less likely to break no matter what provocative situation may crop up.

The three final elements of the Path make up the concentration group. They are effort, mindfulness and concentration. Strenuous, tireless effort is required if we are to be able to apply our minds sufficiently to penetrate through the apparent truths of life and really understand the ultimate realities. Without some understanding and careful thinking we will not be able to clearly distinguish those unwholesome states of mind that effort must be put forth in order to eliminate from the wholesome ones which must be cultivated with similarly great energy. Unless these distinctions are known, the effort cannot be Right Effort which is the Path factor. "A monk puts forth desire, makes an effort, begins to strive, applies his mind, lays hold of his mind to prevent the arising of ill unprofitable states not yet arisen. As to all unprofitable states that have arisen, he puts forth desire to destroy them. [As to profitable states that have not yet arisen, he puts forth desire for their arising.] As to the profitable states that have already arisen, he puts forth desire, makes an effort, begins to strive, applies his mind, lays hold of his mind for their continuance, for the non-confusion, for their more-becoming, increase, culture and fulfillment. That, monks, is called 'right effort'" (K.S., V, p. 8). Hence effort strengthens and supports thorough, deep investigation, and conversely, investigation leads to the understanding of how effort is to be correctly applied.

As has already been discussed at some length, there is a very close link between mindfulness and investigation; they are totally interdependent and it is often impossible in practice to distinguish them from each other at any given moment. The four stations of mindfulness -- of body, of feelings, of mind, and of mental objects -- are to be cultivated by means of contemplating on, thinking through their //anicca// (and also //dukkha// and //anatta//) nature. "A monk dwells contemplating the rise of things in body. He dwells contemplating the fall of things in body; he dwells contemplating both the rise and fall of things in body; and in feelings, in mind, in mind-objects, ardent, composed and mindful by having restrained coveting and dejection with regard to the world ... This, monks, is called 'the cultivation of a station of mindfulness'" (K.S., V, p. 160). Mindfulness of the body must include a well thought out understanding of its transient nature, of the inevitability of its decay and death -- //anicca//; of its unsatisfactoriness as, ultimately, we cannot control its fate as it brings with it the myriad forms of physical suffering -- //dukkha//; and of the fact that it cannot rightly be considered "I" or "mine" since we cannot control its changes or make it remain as we wish to -- //anatta//. The specific exercises in mindfulness of the body (such as on the breath or the thirty-two parts of the body) if practiced for insight not just for concentration, must include such contemplation on the essential nature of the body.

The same kind of thought is required for the proper cultivation of (//vedananupassana//) contemplation of feelings, contemplation of mind (//cittanupassana//) and contemplation of mind-objects (//dhammanupassana//). The Buddha told a group of elder monks to instruct the novices in this fashion: "In feelings do ye abide contemplating feelings (as transient) ardent, composed, one-pointed, of tranquil mind, calmed down, of concentrated mind, for insight into feelings as they really are. In mind ... for insight into mind as it really is. In mind-states ... for insight into mind-states as they really are" (K.S., V, p. 123). This means that feelings, mind and mind objects are to be observed and considered most carefully, concentratedly and objectively in order to gain true insight into their ultimately unstable nature. In //vedananupassana// (the particular technique taught by S. N. Goenka //et al//), it is the combination of the meditative experience of //feeling//, the subtle changing sensations, produced in the body by its bio-chemical processes which reflect the changing //mind-states//, with Right Thought about the ultimate nature of all the five aggregates that can free us of all our ignorance and so of our //tanha// and //dukkha//. The experience of free flow -- feeling the sensations throughout the body in one sweep or all at one time (the sensations which are continually being produced by the changing kalapas, the subatomic particles of which the whole mass of the body is composed) -- alone, without understanding the far-reaching significance of these sensations, can be just like any other experience, a thing of passing interest that has no substantive effect on our lives. Similarly infertile will be mere intellectualizing about ultimate realities without any direct way of knowing them within our own five aggregate phenomena through mindful meditation. Careful analysis and rational thinking must also be applied mindfully, in an ongoing way, to the activity of the //mind// and to the objects of thought. Thus in order to carry the four stations of mindfulness to their goal, the transiency, unsatisfactoriness and essencelessness of these phenomena must be comprehended.

On the other hand, without one-pointed concentration investigation will be shallow and unable to penetrate through the conventions of the apparent truths we perceive because the mind will not be able to remain on one subject long enough. Concentration cannot be powerful if the mind is constantly intrigued by and grasps at the thoughts that come and go; and only when we understand how useless and //dukkha//-ridden is everything in the mind, will it become detached and disinterested and so naturally tend to stay put on the chosen salutary object.

Thus we see how investigative Dhamma thinking is an integral part of the development of Right Thought and Right Understanding, how careful contemplation strengthens morality, how //sila// allows //dhammavicaya// to deepen, how careful consideration shows where effort is to be applied, the ultimate significance of the objects of mindfulness, which enables concentration to grow, and conversely how the development of these three elements of the //samadhi// section of the Path contributes to the deepening and widening scope of Dhamma investigation. So, once we begin to develop systematic attention, we are starting to walk on the Path, the Fourth Noble Truth set out by the Buddha, the Way which enables us to develop minds which are totally detached and at peace, free from ignorance, from craving, and so from suffering. //dhammavicaya// -- Right Thought -- supports us at all stages and all aspects of the Path and developments of the other Path factors similarly contributes to the growth of investigation of Dhamma.

Conclusion

//Dhammavicaya// -- investigation of reality -- is one of the most important tools to be used by the meditator seeking liberating insight and freedom from //dukkha//, suffering, as has here been shown. By means of careful investigation in meditation we are able to penetrate the apparent truths and come to full realization of the ultimate nature of the phenomena of existence. So by keen thinking in the course of Vipassana meditation we come to understand thoroughly how our own five aggregates and all the external mental and material universe (nama-rupa) perceived by the senses, are utterly transient, arising and passing away at every moment as the causes that produced them do likewise. Because every dhamma is so unstable, the five aggregates can never bring true happiness but only //dukkha//, as such changing and unsatisfactory phenomena are utterly essenceless and not worth clinging to, not to be taken as "I" or "mine." As we seriously consider all this and also investigate the cause-and-effect nature of all life processes and contemplate the Noble Truths of Dukkha, its Cause, its Cessation and the Way leading to its Cessation, while persevering in our meditation, craving (//tanha//) must weaken and detachment, liberation must develop. And as the other Enlightenment and Path Factors are also brought to perfection with the support of //dhammavicaya// -- complete freedom from all future birth and so of future suffering is attained.

Our good tendencies from the past have put us in the exceedingly fortunate position of being born as human beings during the time of a Buddha's dispensation, and they have brought us into contact with this incomparable jewel, the Dhamma. So now is the time to exert and strengthen our present mental volition towards liberation. To free ourselves from //dukkha//, we must strive to experience and investigate, to realize and understand, the ultimate truths of existence. With this insight, this wisdom, the mind becomes utterly detached, and since it is completely independent of all the world's changing, unsatisfactory and essenceless phenomena, there is absolute Peace and Freedom.

May all beings be Happy!
May all beings be Peaceful!
May all beings be Liberated!

THE PRACTICE IN BRIEF Those who practice the Dhamma should train themselve in the following stages: The training that is easy to learn, gives immediate results, and suitable for every time, every place, for people of every age and either sex, is to study in th of this body// -- a fathom long, a cubit wide, and a span thick -- with its perceiving mind in This body has many things, ranging from the crude to the subtle, that are well worth knowin steps of the training: 1. To begin with, know that the body is composed of various phy properties, the major ones being the properties of earth, water, fire, and wind; the minor on aspects that adhere to the major ones: things like color, smell, shape, etc. These prop unstable (inconstant), stressful, and full of filth. If you look into them deeply, you will see th there's no substance to them at all. They are simply impersonal conditions, with nothing w "me" or "mine." When you can clearly perceive the body in these terms, you will be able to clinging or attachment to it as an entity, your self, someone else, this or that. 2. The s step is to deal with mental phenomena (feelings, perceptions, thought-formations, and con on keeping track of the truth that these are characterized by arising, persisting, and then In other words, their nature is to arise and disband, arise and disband, repeatedly. When y to see this truth, you will be able to let go of your attachments to mental phenomena as en self, someone else, this or that. 3. Training on the level of practice doesn't simply mea studying, listening, or reading. You have to practice so as to see clearly with your own min following steps: a. Start out by brushing aside all external concerns and turn to look i your own mind until you can know in what ways it is clear or murky, calm or unsettled. The is to have mindfulness and self-awareness in charge as you keep aware of the body and trained the mind to stay firmly in a state of normalcy. b. Once the mind can stay in a s normalcy, you will see mental formations or preoccupations in their natural state of arising disbanding. The mind will be empty, neutral, and still -- neither pleased nor displeased -- a physical and mental phenomena as they arise and disband naturally, of their own accord. the knowledge that there is no self to any of these things becomes thoroughly clear, you w something that lies further inside, beyond all suffering and stress, free from the cycles of deathless -- free from birth as well as death, since all things that take birth must by nature ill, and die. d. When you see this truth clearly, the mind will be empty, not holding on anything. It won't even assume itself to be a mind or anything at all. I.e., it won't latch onto being anything of any sort. All that remains is a pure condition of Dhamma. e. Those pure condition of Dhamma in full clarity are bound to grow disenchanted with the repeated life. When they know the truth of the world and the Dhamma throughout, they will see the clearly, right in the present, that //there exists that which lies beyond all suffering//. They w this without having to ask or take it on faith from anyone, for the Dhamma is //paccattam,/ something really to be known for oneself. Those who have see this truth within themselves always. K. Khao-suan-luang

The first thing is sim And don't latch onto what you know -- because whatever it is, it's simply a phenomenon th disbands, arises and disbands, changing as part of its nature. So your awareness has firm stance right at the mind in and of itself. In the beginning stages you have to know that mindfulness is standing firm, the mind won't be affected by the objects of sensory contact. maintaining this stance, holding firm to this stance. If you gain a sense of this for yourself, knowing and seeing for yourself, your mindfulness will become even more firm. If anything at all, you'll be able to let it go -- and all the many troubles and turmoils of the mind will dis away. If mindfulness slips and the mind goes out giving meanings to anything, latchin anything, troubles will arise, so you have to keep checking on this with every moment. The that's so worth checking on. You have to keep check on the mind in and of itself, contemp in and of itself. Or else you can contemplate the body in and of itself, feelings in and of ther or the phenomenon of arising and disbanding -- i.e., the Dhamma -- in and of itself. All of th are themes you can keep track of entirely within yourself. You don't have to keep track of a themes, because having a lot of themes is what will make you restless and distracted. First this theme, then you'll practice that, then you'll make comparisons, all of which will keep the from growing still. If you can take your stance at awareness, if you're skilled at looking mind can be at peace. You'll know how things arise and disband. First practice keeping aw within yourself so that your mindfulness can be firm, without being affected by the objects contact, so that it won't label things as good or bad, pleasing or displeasing. You have to k to see that when the mind can be at normalcy, centered and neutral as its primary stance whatever it knows or sees -- it will be able to contemplate and let go. The sensations i mind that we explain at such length are still on the level of labels. Only when there can be right at awareness// will you really be able to know that the mind that is aware of awarene way doesn't send its knowing outside of this awareness. There are no issues. Nothing can the mind when it knows in this way. In other words, An inward-staying unentan knowing, All outward-going knowing cast aside. The only thing you have to w maintaining is the state of mind at normalcy -- knowing, seeing, and still in the present. If y maintain it, if you don't keep looking after it, then when sensory contact comes it will have a The mind will go out with labels of good and bad, liking and disliking. So make sure you m basic awareness that's aware right at yourself. And don't let there be any labeling. No matt sensory contact comes, you have to make sure that this awareness comes first. If you yourself correctly in this way, everything will stop. You won't go straying out through your s sight, hearing, etc. The mind will stop and look, stop and be aware right at awareness, so the truth that all things arise and disband. There's no real truth to anything. Only our stupid latches onto things, giving them meanings and then suffering for it -- suffering because of ignorance, suffering because of its unacquaintance with the five aggregates -- form, feeling perceptions, thought-formations, and consciousness-- all of which are inconstant, stressful.

Use mindfulness to gather your awareness together, and the mind will stop getting un running after things. It will be able to stop and be still. Then make it know in this way, see i way //constantly// -- at every moment, with every activity. Work at watching and knowing th itself: That will be enough to cut away all sorts of issues. You won't have to concern yourse them. If the body is in pain, simply keep watch of it. You can simply keep watch of fee the body because the mind that's aware of itself in this way can keep watch of anything wit Or it can simply be aware of itself to the point where it lets go of things outside, lets go of contact, and keeps constant watch on the mind in and of itself. That's when you'll know tha the mind is like when it's at peace: It doesn't give meanings to anything. It's the emptiness mind unattached, uninvolved, unconcerned with anything at all. These words - unattac uninvolved, and unconcerned -- are things you have to consider carefully, because what th subtle and deep. "Uninvolved" means uninvolved with sensory contact, undisturbed by the "Unconcerned" means not worried about past, future, or present. You have to contemplate until you know them skillfully. Even though they're subtle, you have to contemplate them ur them thoroughly. And don't go concerning yourself with external things, because they'll kee unsettled, keep you running, keep you distracted with labels and thoughts of good and bad of thing. You have to put a stop to these things. If you don't, your practice won't accomplish because these things keep playing up to you and deceiving you -- i.e., once you see anythi you into seeing it as right, wrong, good, bad, and so forth. Eventually you have to com the awareness that everything simply arises, persists, and then disbands. //Make sure stay the disbanding//. If you watch just the arising, you may get carried off on a tangent, but if yo the disbanding you'll see emptiness: Everything is disbanding every instant. No matter wha no matter what you see, it's there for just an instant and then disbands. Then it arises again disbands. There's simply arising, knowing, disbanding. So let's watch what happens o accord -- because the arising and disbanding that occurs by way of the senses is somethin of its own accord. You can't prevent it. You can't force it. If you look and know it without atta there will be none of the harm that comes from joy or sorrow. The mind will stay in relative and neutrality. But if you're forgetful and start latching on, labeling things in pairs in any wa -- good and bad, happy and sad, pleasing and displeasing -- the mind will become unsettle empty, no longer still. When this happens you have to probe on in to know why. All worthless issues that arise in the mind have to be cut away. The Blue Cliff Record Case 24
Isan and Iron Grindstone Lu

Master EngoÕs Pointer
Stand on the summit of the highest peak and demons and outsiders cannot know you. Walk on the bottom of the deepest sea and even the BuddhaÕs eye cannot catch sight of you. Even if your eyes are like shooting stars and your intellect is like flashing lightning, still you wonÕt avoid being like the spirit tortoise dragging his tail leaving traces. At this point, what is proper? To test I site this old case. Listen.

The Main Case
Iron Grindstone Lu arrived at IsanÕs, Isan said, ÒOld cow, so youÕve come.Ó The Grindstone said, ÒTomorrow thereÕs a great communal feast on Taizan, are you going to go teacher?Ó Isan relaxed his body and lay down. The Grindstone immediately left.

Master SetchoÕs Verse
Once riding an iron horse she entered the fortress.
The edict comes down reporting that the six nations are cleared.
Still holding the golden whip she questions the returning traveler.
In the depths of the night, who will go along to walk the royal road?

In yesterdayÕs koan, we made reference to Iron Grindstone Lu doing dharma combat with Shiko. Today I picked one of the koans from the Blue Cliff Record that has to do specifically with Iron Grindstone Lu. Her name in Japanese is pronounced Ryu Ketsuma. Ryu was her family name, in Chinese thatÕs pronounced Lu. So we translate Iron Grindstone and left the Chinese name Lu, Iron Grindstone Lu. Ketsu means iron, and ma means mill. So itÔs a mill that grinds iron instead of grinding wheat or rice. She earned this nickname because of her ability in dharma combat. She was known throughout that part of China during that period of time as being a terrible opponent in dharma combat, that would just grind up any of the monks that came to challenge her. She was a successor of Master Isan, and Isan was part of the lineage of Yakujo. Yakujo received the transmission from Baso. So Yakujo was one of the 84 enlightened disciples of Baso, and Yakujo transmitted to several people. He also transmitted to Obaku, who became the teacher of Rinzai and the beginning of the Rinzai line. He also transmitted to Isan who along with his dharma successor Kyogen, began another line that continued for many generations. They were both part of what we call the five houses of Zen in China at that period of time. Another one of those houses was the Tozan school, or the Soto school. Both the Rinzai and Soto lineages are part of our monastery here. Those are the only two that continued through time and are still alive and well to this day.

Isan was also probably, one of the best known teachers of that period of time, he had some fifty four people that he transmitted to. It was a period of time that Zen was in itÕs golden age. IÔve often wondered why. Other times in the history of Zen if a teacher could find only one succesor would feel very fortunate. Down to the present day usually teachers have only two or three successors at the most. Some of them, but itÕs very unusual may have as many as six or seven. But during that time, fifty or a hundred were not unusual. Isan had fifteen hundred monks living at his monastery. The monastery that he had was on Isan mountain, thatÕs how most of these masters got their names, they took the name of the mountain that they lived on. The year was 848, so it was the ninth century, and by imperial decree Buddhism was reestablished after eight years of fierce prosecution. That used to go on a lot. The years that Buddhism was in China. ItÕs even happened just recently, I think I mentioned it just recently, so one period of time if the emperor happened to be a Buddhist, then Buddhism was in and everyone was a Buddhist. Buddhism flourished, and the emperor would build monasteries and some Zen master would become the National Teacher and have the ear of the emperor, and train the emperor's children and that's about as close they got to right action, being able to influence the Emperor's decisions. And then that emperor would leave and a new emperor would come in who was a Taoist, and all of the Buddhist monasteries would be destroyed and all the Buddhist monks chased out back into lay practice or beheaded in some cases and the Taoist's would be back in, back and forth it would go. But somehow that continuity remained. And the reason it remained was that what was transmitted was not what's in the text. So you can burn monasteries, you can burn the sutras, you can burn the records of the masters. What's transmitted is alive and goes from mind to mind so you can't see it. It goes from generation to generation, from person to person. In fact everything else is it's context, a matrix that's created so that the mind to mind transmission can happen. Every teacher has a teacher, and although we realize it ourselves, there's nothing that the teacher can give you, it's already there that which is to be realized, still in the Zen lineage, the approval of the teacher is a requirement so that you determine the authenticity of a lineage by tracing it back. And it's all documented. It's not that it's not documented, it is documented after the fact, after the mind to mind transmission, when transmission has already occurred, when the documents verifying it have already been passed on. That's what's kept it alive, that's what's kept it very vital. Each generation each teacher has the burden of responsibility to manifest the dharma according to the circumstances they encounter. So the dharma always fills the vessel that contains it. It's not like trying to take something that was written 2000 years ago and getting it to fit in the 20th century. It fits because it was transmitted to a 20th century person.

This koan takes place about five years before Isan's death at age 83, so he was in his late seventies at the time of this encounter. He had built a temple on Isan mountain with his own hands. He was part of what was known as Denhai monks, monks who cultivated the fields and raised cattle. That was a tremendous departure from the original teachings in India. In India, the Vinaya for monks, which is still mantained in the Hinayana tradition, was that a monk doesn't work. It's very much the same in Hasidism where the devout Hasidic Jew studies the scriptures, and devote themselves completely to them, it's almost a form of monasticism, and doesn't work. So it was in Buddhism, and to this day Theravadan monks don't work. The lay practitioners do the work and gain merit by doing the work for them. So they're not allowed to grow their own food, they beg for their food, so to be a mendicant is an important part of the process. In Hinayana Buddhsim that remains true, but in Mahayana Buddhism, particularly when it went to China. At first the Mahayana Buddhists also did the same thing, they didn't work, so long as there was a way to support them. But as the monasteries started to be located in the very far reaching regions of China in the mountain ranges, there were no villages to go to to beg. The winters were very very severe so in order to survive, they needed to grow their own food, they needed to cultivate and work in the fields, and that began with Yakujo, Isan's teacher. Yakujo's very famouns for saying, "A day of no work, a day of no food." That was the basic rule of his temple. If you didn't work, you didn't eat, because these monks didn't want to work. You know that was breaking the rules of the Vinaya. But of course the Vinaya was also transmitted mind to mind. In each generation the teacher needs to be able to respond to that Vinaya in a way that's appropriate to the circumstances. There's a lot more to the Vinaya than the surface that appears as the rules, the same with the precepts. People looking at the precepts, reading the sixteen precepts think that what you read is what they are, but it goes much beyond that. And in fact how far beyond that is not even possible to understand until one's training is virtually completed, it's at the end of formal training, after, fifteen or twenty years of training, that we take up the precepts as koans. One hundred and twenty koans to test one's understanding of the precepts. The precepts are also transmitted as well as given in the ceremony. Given as an act of faith in the beginning of one's training. They're actually transmitted as part of the transmision of the dharma at the end of training. So Yakujo made that rule, and in fact when he became to old to work, his monks felt sorry for him because he was such an old man, they didn't want him to work. They begged him to stop working. He said, "No, the rule is, a day of no work, a day of no food." So they took his tools and they hid them, and he stopped eating. So finally they had to give him the tools back, and he kept working until the day he died.

And Isan being a part of that lineage went off and started a temple on Isan Mountain, and they cultivated the fields and also raised cattle. I guess the cattle were raised for food, for milk, for food, whatever, as well as the cultivation of the fields. So all of their sustenance came from the mountain, whatever they could get from working with that.

Now Isan, because I guess cattle were very dominant; if you went to his monastery you probably stepped over tons of buffalo dung to get to the main gate, there were grazing cattle all over the place. Buffalo were very much up front in his way of teaching, I'm sure it came up again and again, just like when we had a gourmet deli, that would always come up in dharma talks here. It was always being related to the circimstances the students find themselves in. So one of his favorite koans that he would say to his monks was that in many years from now, in two hundred years, at the front gate of this monastery I will be reborn as a buffalo. And on the side of the buffalo will be written, 'This is monk Isan.' If you call it a buffalo, it's monk Isan. If you call it monk Isan, it's a buffalo. What will you call it. It's one of the two hundred koans that students need to work with here at Doshinji. Now obviously, old Iron Grindstone Lu, who was his successor must have passed through that old koan of the buffalo, and I think that's why he personally called her 'old buffalo cow.' In some of the translations they say 'old female buffalo.' For obvious reasons in English, calling someone an old cow is derogatory. Calling someone an old bull is not, so some of the translations say 'old female buffalo.' But you should understand the point of it, in Chinese that wouldn't be a derogatory statement. And that's what the word means in Chinese, it means cow. It's a different character for cow than it is for the male buffalo.

So Iron Grindstone Lu who had now succeeded Isan and had built a hermitage on an adjoining peak of Isan Mountain came to visit him. Master Engo, in speaking of the nun, Iron Grindstone said that she was like, "Stone struck spark, like a lightning flash. Hesitate and you lose your body and your life. In the path of meditation if you get to the most essential place, where are there so many things? This meeting of adepts is like seeing horns on the other side of the wall and knowing immediately that there's an ox. Or seeing smoke on the other side of the mountain and immediately knowing there's a fire. When pushed, they move. When pressed they turn about." That is they fuction freely, both of them. Both of them are adepts, that's the thing to see. That the complete merging of parent and child, child and parent had been complete with these two.

Iron Grindstone Lu had studied for a long time, her active edge was sharp and dangerous. She built a hut a few miles from Isan Mountain and one day went to call on Isan. When he saw her coming, he said, "Old cow, so you've come." The Grindstone said, "Tomorrow there's a great communal feast on Mount Tai. Are you going to go teacher?" Isan relaxed his body and lay down whereupon Grindstone left. Engo said, "All of you look! Throughout they seem to be conversing, but this is not Zen neither is it Taoism. Can it be understood by calling it unconcerned?" Is that what his reaction was. In one of the first translations of this koan, one that was produced many, many years ago, that's what the translator said, that he was unconcerned. That's not what the point of this koan is. There's a lot more to be seen.

Now Isan Mountain was over six hundred miles from Mount Tai. How then did Iron Grindstone Lu want Isan to go to the feast. They didn't have planes in those days. It's like one of the students from here coming to me and saying, "Daido, in a half hour there's going to be a party at ZCLA in Los Angeles, are you going to go?" So what was the meaning? Engo says, "This old lady understands Isan's conversation. Fibre coming, thread going. One letting go, one gathering in. They answer back to each other like two mirrors reflecting each other, without any reflecting image to be seen. Action to action they complement each other, phrase to phrase they accord." This is a perfect example, this dialog, of that completion between teacher and disciple. Two mirrors face to face, reflecting with no image in between. Why is there no image in between? Why is it that they can't be seen by the Buddha's and ancestors? Why is it that the eye cannot see itself? When you are the thing itself, there's no separation. You need to be outside of something in order to see it. You need to separated in order to see it. In true intimacy, there's no knowing. There's no seeing. There's no eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, or mind. These two are one reality, they function freely. The fibre coming, the thread going, in sewing. One letting go, rolling out, one gathering in. Letting go and gathering in. Letting go is where the teacher or the adept is positive, nourishing, giving, manifesting in the phenomenal world, in the relative. Holding back, they're not there, they take away. One rolls out, the other gathers in, the other rolls out, the other gathers in. It's in complete harmony. It's like a beautiful dance, a beautiful dharma dance. They complement each other. Phrase to phrase they accord. Then Engo says, "People these days can be poked three times and not turn their heads. But this old lady couldn't be fooled one little bit. No means is this an emotional view based on mundane truth. Like a bright mirror on a stand. Like a bright jewel in the palm of the hand. When a foreigner comes, the foreigners reflect it. When a native comes, the native relects it. It's that she knows there's something transcendent, that's why she acts like this." That bright mirror on its stand is the mirror of samadhi. So whatever is there, it reflects it. Doesn't interpret it, analyze it, judge it, characterize it, understand it, file it, store it, manipulate it, love it or hate it. It reflects it perfectly. The perfect mirror of samadhi.

This kind of dharma combat constantly went on during China's golden age of Zen. There were these constant pilgrimmages that monks would make, from monastery to monastery. Testing, sharpening their understanding. Perfecting, going further. What's the limit? How far can you go? There's no edge, there's no boundary. Where's the edge of the universe? If you think there's an edge, then what is it that's just beyond the edge? You too are just like that.

Engo said, "Right now you're content to understand this is unconcern. " This is Isan's lying down. Another master said, "Don't take having concerns as not having concerns. Time and time again, concern is born of unconcern. If you can immerse yourself into this and penetrate through, you'll see that Isan and Iron Grindstone Lu acting in this way is the same sort as ordinary people's conversation. People are often hindered by words, that's why they don't understand. Only an intimate acquaintance can understand them thoroughly." Intimate acquaintance means, realizing that Buddha mind. "Time and time again, concern is born of unconcern." A nice way of understanding compassion. We think of compassion as doing good, but that's not what compassion is. Doing good is doing good. Compassion is quite different. It functions freely with no sense of separation between the doer and the thing that the doer is doing. It happens like the way you grow your hair, it just happens. If someone falls, you pick them up. It's the same intimacy in which their is no knowing. There's no separation. It comes out of wisdom. Wisdom is the realization of no separation. Compassion is the activity that comes out of that realization. So it's very different from doing good. Tokusan's sixty blows was an act of grandmotherly compassion. Not a punishment. Rinzai's fist, an act of compassion. Desperately these teachers wanted their disciples to realize themselves, make themselves free. To realize the inherent freedom that's their very life just as it is. So can this be understood by calling it unconcerned? "When letting go they both let go. When rolling in they both roll in." We call this in Zen training the merging of perspectives.

In the footnote to this Main Case when Iron Grindstone said, "Tomorrow there's a great communal feast on Taizan, are you going to go teacher." The footnote says, 'The arrow is sharp to no purpose. In China they beat the drum. In Korea they dance. The letting go was too fast, the gathering in was too slow.' 'In China they beat the drum. In Korea they dance.' Daido drinks sake, Kyodo gets drunk. No separation.

Master Setcho's Verse

Once riding an iron horse she enters the fortress.
The edict comes down reporting that the six nations are cleared.
Still holding the golden whip she questions the returning traveler.
In the depths of the night who will go along to walk the royal road.

This is a very very clear verse, some of them are difficult to follow. 'Once riding an iron horse she enters the fortress.' This is praising Iron Grindstone Lu, coming as she did to Isan. 'The edict comes down reporting that the six nations are cleared.' This is praising the way Isan questioned her. 'Still holding the golden whip she questions the returning traveler.' This is praising Grindstone saying "Tomorrow there's a great communal feast on Taizan, are you going to go teacher?" In the depths of the night, who will go along to walk the royal road?' This praises Isan relaxing his body and Iron Grindstone immediately turning and leaving.

Once Seppo commented on this case with verse. He said:

Standing on the summit of the highest peak, unknown to demons and outsiders.

Walking on the bottom of the deepest sea unseen even by the Buddha's eyes.

That's referring to one of the ranks of Master Tozan, the five ranks of Tozan. It refers to a very highly developed state of understanding. While on the mountain peak manifesting in the market place. While in the market place, alone on the mountain peak. The merging of absolute and relative.

A monk once asked Seppo, "When Isan said, 'Old cow, so you've come.' What was his inner meaning?" Seppo said, "In the depths of the white clouds the golden dragon leaps." The golden dragon of course is Iron Grindstone, an enlightened being. The dragon always functions in the clouds, flies with the clouds. The monk said, "When Iron Grindstone Lu said, 'Tomorrow there's a great communal feast on Taizan, are you going to go teacher?' What was her inner meaning?" Seppo said, "In the heart of the blue waves the jade rabbit bolts." The monk said, "When Isan immediately lay down, what was his inner meaning?" Seppo said, "Old and worn out, decrepit and lazy. Days without concern, lying idly deep in sleep facing the blue mountains." Is this unconcerned?

It's said that Iron Grindstone was fully equipped with the seven items of a warrior. The seven items of a warrior are also the seven items of a teacher. What those seven items are: One is great capacity and great function. The second is swiftness of wit and eloquent mind. The third is wonderous spirituality of speech and movement, that is being able to manifest live words not dead words. Fourth an active edge to kill or to give life. To kill is to have someone understand the absolute basis of reality. To give life is to show it, manifest it in the ten thousand things. Fifth, wide learning and broad experience. The sixth, clarity of mirroring awareness, that perfect great mirror of samadhi. And seven the freedom to appear or disappear. That is to let go or to hold fast. That is to give and nourish or to take away and disappear.

The question; 'what did Isan mean when he said, "Old buffalo cow so you've come.'" The footnote to that statement says, 'Check a probing pole, a reed shade, where should you look to see the obscurity.' Probing pole, what was Iron Grindstone's purpose in asking tfeh question, "There's a great communal feast on Taizan, are you going to go teacher?" The footnote said, 'In China they beat the drum, in Korea they dance.' "Isan relaxed his body and laid down." The footnote says, 'The arrow got him. Where will you see Isan.' The Grindstone immediately left. The footnote says, 'She's gone. She saw the opportunity and acted. How will you understand this?'

We tend to look at our practice in a very abstract way. We tend to equate the practice with the monastery. Some kind of a sanctuary that's removed from the world. We come to the monastery, we're quiet, we're gentle. We bow to each other, we go back out into the world and we push and we shove. So on the left hand we have the monastery, and the left hand we have the world. We live in a period of time where self-centerdness is the key. Overwhelming self-centeredness. The "me" generation. I'm worth it. It's kind of interesting, there's an ad that appears on television now continually for the lottery, it shows people responding to the obvious question, "What would you do if you won, several million dollars, ten million dollars in a lottery?" And it's very interesting the responses. One person's going to buy the company they work for and fire the boss. Somebody else is going to buy his and her's Maseratis. Somebody else is going to buy and island and on and on. It's kind of interesting, they're all self-centered answers. It's not so much that, this is not a sampling of the public. Becuase they're all actors that are responding, it's obvious. But the thing that's interesting to me is that these companies don't advertize things unless a lot of research is done. And what that research indicated, what people wanted to do with their lottery money is self-centered. Nobody talked about helping the poor, of housing the homeless, or donating some of it to AIDS research, or any of the ten thousand needs that exist out there. And the reason, they didn't talk about it is that that doesn't appeal to the public. The research indicated that if you want people to take a chance on the lottery, then you're going to have to give them very self-centered motivations in order to do it. It's just like all the other advertizing it's self-centered. And the reason the advertizing is self-centered, is it's a perfect mirror of what's going on. If you want to understand a country or a society, look at the advertizing. Having worked in that field for many years I know. A lot of research goes into it. They know their customers. And they know them well. What does it say about this time and place that we exist in? What does it say to us when we realize that seven people running for public office in New York City are under indictment, two of them convicted felons. They're about to take public office, about to be given public trust. What's wrong when we realize that in business there's incredible corruption, in politics incredible corruption, in religion incredible corruption. Where have we failed? And as I've mentioned before when you really look at it, what it's about is power. And the illusion that what power is, is money, the ability to manipulate and control people, things, and in a sense from a mundane point of view that's what power is. But real power, spiritual power, is the realization of the self, is the freedom that comes out of that realization. The freedom that was manifested with these two adepts, when you see the point of what this dialog was between the two of them. It's a period of time that the relationship's disintergrating, family is slowly becoming obselete, compassion is almost non-existent. What can we do?

It's really important to keep asking, to keep questioning. But ask yourself, and answer yourself. That's what zazan is about. Be master of yourself. It's the same with this koan, where do you see the point of this koan? The answer is within the questions themselves. Don't separate yourself from Iron Grindstone or Isan. The answer is within yourself, in your life. Not some abstraction or some esoteric doctrine, but this very life itself.

Please use the remainder of this sesshin as if your life depended on it. Don't waste a moment of it, because your life does depend on it. To enter this incredible way is probably the most imortant thing that any one of us will ever do with our lives. It goes far beyond mundane power, position, authority, money. It has to do with very stuff that life itself is made of. So throw yourself into it, totally. Into your zazen, into the chanting, into the bowing, into the work, into sesshin and unify the mind. Don't hold back. Take a chance. Let go. Let go of whatever you're holding on to. That's the way you practice the edge. Life is a precious gift. It doesn't need to be consumed in pain and suffering. It's perfect and it's complete, lacking nothing, just as it is. And if you haven't realized that truth yet, this is the time to do it. Each one of us are fully equipped Buddhas. Fully equipped human beings. There's nothing that you need that you don't have there. You have it. It needs to be realized.

"I think you nailed it. No bullshit."

After we finished the midnight snack, we got ready for bed, gave each other one more slow

"Like a baby," she relied. "I woke up in the middle of the night, saw you sleeping like an ang to come. So I did."

I laughed. "I know exactly how you felt."

Back in the bed, she laid me down and made slow, luxurious love to me. I was lost in the pl again and again. With very expert fingers, she massaged my G spot to three multi orgasmic and hip grinding climaxes. After the third, I had to pull her hand away.

As the wine steward walked away, I looked at Kurt with a serious face."What is Chateau Ma going to cost?" Dinners in the formal dining room were not included in the resort package.

Kurt moved in, guided his cock to my wet vaginal entrance and eased in. I groaned and Kurt fucking mode. Nothing gentle, which suited me just fine. He wasn't pounding, but was stroki fast but not frantic. He looked at me with lustful eyes and I just pulled my knees back further

"Good night Kathy." I was as content as I had ever been. In a minute I was asleep.

At first I slept soundly, like a woman at peace. In the middle of the night I woke up. Kurt was murmuring and moving his head side to side. I couldn't make out the words but he was obvi

He continued to toss but after a minute of my hand on his bo quieting voice, he seemed to relax. I listened as his breathing slowed and his body went cal close and went back to sleep.

I had vague and uncomfortable dreams. I was with Isabella and Sarah burst in. She was lau sarcastic and hurtful. "Aren't I good enough for you? Guys not good enough? Have to get it girls?" In my dream I felt so ashamed. Kurt was looking at me, shocked. I felt abandoned an He pointed at me. "Slut. Whore. Kiddie fucking ass fucker." I felt like I was falling. Falling an wouldn't stop. I felt a pressure build up, smothering me, cutting off my breathing....I waited t but just kept falling, suffocating...dying...

"Kathy, wake up! Wake up!" I felt myself being shaken. I struggled to come back. With a sud sitting up, I was awake. The bedside lamp was on. I was cold with sweat. Kurt was looking a I was in his bed, in his room. I was back. I collapsed back on the bed, panting.

I paused and then said, "Yes. Thank you, I'm okay. Bad dream. Bad." Kurt got back into the the lamp. He pulled me to him and held me tight.

"Go back to sleep. Every things all right." With his hand massaging my neck and back, I slo resettled. Forcing my breathing to slow and to fill my tummy, I felt the calm return. With Kurt kissing my forehead, I fell asleep.

When I woke, Kurt was not there. A fleeting panic was stilled by the sound of the shower ru smelled coffee. I got up, still nude, poured my self a cup and went into the bathroom. He looked relieved. "Thank God." After doing each others hair, we stepped out and towelled

"I'll be there," he relied and with one more kiss, I walked out the door.

Back in my room I wondered what I was getting myself into. After all the sex with Sarah and the girl at the beach store as well as the three guys, Dan especially, I wasn't sure if I was a g woman for Kurt. I had been acting like a sex starved woman in a room full of willing partners that. It was exactly what I had been doing. Then I thought of Isabella, the teen child who, tw watching me masturbate with the Jacuzzi jets and then was herself masturbating in my lap w certain if Kurt knew about that, he would be shocked and put off me forever.

I called Sarah's room. She was in."Well hello, Kathy. Where have you been? Dan was lookin

I silently said 'Thank God' and told Sarah I would catch up with her later. I got into my bikini, with a daytime outfit and went to meet Kurt.

On the pool deck we had brunch. It was served with champagne and orange juice. I felt relie the guys were going to walk up and spoil things. Kurt and I decided to catch some sun at the to go into town later in the afternoon and meet with a local professional astronomer to discus project. 'Why not?' I thought and lay down on the towel, face up. Kurt ran sunscreen over me, and pa attention to my breasts than the rest.

As he was rubbing it over my lower tummy he said, "You know, that bottom piece of yours p out the sun," and I just lifted it up a bit and he slid his hand under to get my minimally covere there as well. He let his hand linger and gave my clit a quick tickle.

"You're terrible!" I said and gave him a cute pout.

He removed his hand and as I let the bottom fall back, he cupped my pussy and said, "It rea shame to have this part of you sunburned. I'm only doing it for your comfort and safety."

I laughed. "You're doing it for your future comfort and happiness." Kurt gave me a slight pat, his hand away.

"Works for me."

We laid in the sun, occasionally talking, mostly just relaxing and let the heat melt away the s life. When I turned over, Kurt was right there to do my back. He didn't have to move any part bottom as it was only string on that side. I was proud of my butt, still firm and smooth, with n cellulite. He stayed there for a wonderful extra amount of time.

As his hands went up my inner thighs, I parted my legs, knowing it would give him a perfect my camel toed labia. He didn't move for a moment, and then said, "Yes Kathy, you truly are beautiful woman." He lay down on his stomach and I got up and did his back. As I was leani breasts free to move a bit, a man and woman walked by. I glanced up. The man was beamir scowling at me and then caught the man's expression. She gave him a look that would freez his head to look forward. I smiled. I was still a dish at forty.

After a while, we both turned to face the sun again. We found each other's hands and held t peace than I had in the past twenty years. After about two hours in the sun, it was time to go the pool deck, had a light lunch and as I ate, I looked at Kurt. He looked at me and we both other was thinking. Sex. But Kurt glanced at his watch and gave me a wistful look. "As much to, I do have to get to my meeting. I should be back around seven. Dinner at eight?" he aske

Back in my room, I showered off the sunscreen and dried sweat. Isabella. She came back in cringed. With all that was going so well for me, I still wanted to see her again. I wanted to be the Jacuzzi. I wanted to feel her body against me as it climaxed. I wanted to feel the jets aga pulsing me to orgasm as she watched. I wanted to hold her young and innocent body as we to kiss and fondle her breasts, her thighs and then her budding pussy. I cringed again. Witho hand was on my pussy, massaging as I fantasized. I could taste her vagina. I could feel it tig finger. I could feel her body moving as I massaged her young G spot. I felt her climax startin as I climaxed and then I was alone again, the water my only companion.

I towelled off, sat in a chair in my robe and thought. Stay away from the market. Don't go the as I was talking myself out of it, I was up and getting dressed. Summer blouse, calf length pa sandals and the wrap as a sash. I headed for the market.

THE phase of beliefs which this Suttanta is intended to detail in the opening chapter of my ' American Lectures.'

As there pointed out

far wrongif, in our endeavours to understand the real meaning of the original Buddhism, we attach as much weitht to this question as did the author or authors of these ancient and authoritatinve Buddhist books.

from various forms of the ancient view of a ' soul ' ---a sort of subtle manikin inside the body but separate from it, and continuing, after it leaves the body, as a separate entity--- attempt to reconstruct the past, or to arrange the future.

All such speculation is condemned. And necessarily so, since the Buddhist philosophy is put together without this ancient idea of ' soul.'

The Buddhist scheme endeavours, in other words, to include all the truth which previous thinkers had grafted on to the old savage theories of a semi-material, subtle, permanent entity inside the body, while rejecting those theories themselves ; it endeavours to retain all the philosophic truth which previous thinkers had grafted on to the theosophies---the corollaries of the soul theories---while rejecting those theosophies themselves. The reasons given for this position are threefold : firstly, that such speculators about ultimate things,

Several scholars, and especially---with more knowledge and detail---Dr. Karl Neumann, have maintained that the position of Buddhism in the history of Indian philosophy is analogous to that of Schopenhauer in European philosophy. On the other hand, it is maintained by Professor Deussen that Schopenhauer's position is analogous to that of the Upanishads. The reconciliation will probably be found to be that what Buddhism took over, with more or less of modification, from the Upanishads, is about the same as that part of the what Buddhism took over, with more or less of phraseology, in Schopenhauer ; and what Buddhism rejected altogether is not to be found in Schopenhauer. He himself, who however knew both systens only from second-hand and inaccurate authouities, says, ' If I am to take the results of my own philosophy as the standard of truth, I should be obliged to concede to Buddhism the pre-eminence over other (systems of philosophy).'

However this question may be decided---and its discussion, at the necessary length, by a competent student of philosophy, is a very aressing want---it is certain from the details given in our Suttanta that there were then current in Northern India many other philosophic and theosophic speculations besides those the priests found it expedient to adopt, and have preserved for us in the Upanishads. And who can doubt but that some, if not all of them, may slso have had their influence on the new doctrine ? There was also have had philosophising in India outside the narrow and inexact limits

Professor Cowell has been good enough to inform me that, in his opinion, the attempted restriction of all philosophy to the six Darsanas, and the very use of the term, is late mediaevel. The six are of course not mutually exclusive ; and this, and the omissions in the classification of philosophy under these six heads, render it rather like a classification of animals into men, horses, birds, ghosts, beetles, and sparrows.

Chapter One - The Beginning

My name is Megan. My first marriage went bad because our sexual appetites conflicted; I wa

"Don't I excite you anymore?" I'd ask. I never understood my husband's need for variety.

After the divorce I started dating Trent, It wasn't long and we were married. I suppose everyo

A couple years into our marriage Trent started bringing these men's magazines into our hom girls in these magazines but pictures of naked girls weren't nearly as erotic as the stories.

Trent said he couldn't believe all the things that guys got their wives to do. I told him they we

I went on to the next story. It was along the same lines, wife getting fucked and her husbanc

I've haven't masturbated a lot in my 28 years but this story was getting to me big time. I got t my little panties super wet. Without even thinking about it I slipped my hand under the waistl fingers. I put the magazine down, closed my eyes and made up my own story in my head.

I imagined I was having sex with my brother in his bedroom (I had been raised with my moth my brother and father; I had always admired my brother Bobby romantically). It was hot and

As I played this out in my head I had this great orgasm. Well, I was hooked now. I would rea

Chapter Two - Let the Games Begin

Our sex lives were soon to become a little wilder. We were having a cookout pool party in ou

"Are you kidding me?" I said, "It would turn you on to see guys checking out my boobs?"

"Hell yes it would," Trent replied. "Will you do it for me baby?"

I smiled at him and said, "Okay, if it'll make you happy."

I went back in the bedroom and removed my shirt and bra. With the bra gone I put the white

Trent came in and said, "Now that's what I'm talking about." He came over to me and started breasts right through my shirt. He had been out cleaning the grill.

I pushed him away and said, "Stop it, you're all dirty."

As he was walking back outside he said, "The guys are going to love your hard nipples. The could get their hands on you."

I just hoped the wives and girls didn't think I was acting too sluttish by letting my boobs bour front of their husbands and boyfriends.

Our party was in full swing by early evening. Everybody seemed to be having fun and the be water. Trent and I are not big drinkers so we had to pace ourselves. Just three beers and I'm always says I'm a cheap date. But then, all he can do is a six pack and he passes out, drunk drinking the stuff like it was the last day they were going to get any.

So after two beers I started drinking the punch. I wasn't sure how many Trent had had. Ther kitchen getting more buns out when one of Trent's friends named Mark came in.

That admission turned Trent into a wild man. He started pumping into me hard and fast. I do screwing me as hard and as fast as he was right then. And feel good? Wow! It felt great.

I had no idea that this little boob show that I put on that day would make us both so horny. W sex that night; we just fucked. In fact, we fucked almost all night. Trent just kept going foreve I'm not sure how many orgasms I ended up having. Our game playing had been taken to a r reaping the rewards.

The next morning after a long slow wake up screw, Trent told me that the incident with Mark idea for our next party. It didn't have to be a party as such it could be any get-together. "And just how far would I go with this person?" I asked.

"Just as far as you want, if he starts thinking that he's going to get into your panties, I'll wake save you. Then I'll be the one getting in your panties."

I told Trent that he was mean and that it was a cruel thing to do to some poor guy.

He laughed and said, "Fuck him, he'll have to jack himself off later. Besides, guys like being after we're done with him we can go take care of each other. What do you think?"

I smiled and said, "I think I'll need a few drinks to do this, but what the hell, sounds like it mig fun."

Trent hugged me and said, "Maybe we could try something next weekend."

I gave him a hug and kiss back and said, "I'm sure you'll think of something."

Well the following Saturday Trent came in from doing his yard work and asked if I would like

About that time the guy sitting next to me asked if he could buy my boyfriend and me a drink

Surprised by this I smiled and said, "Sure, thank you and he's my husband."

He introduced himself as Steve. We shook hands and did the cheers thing with our drinks. S from California. He was just in town for the night and was headed back to the west coast on meeting in the morning.

He was pretty good-looking in a rough sort of way, maybe ten years older than Trent. I could band on his left hand. I asked if he was married.

"Yep, 15 years with the same old girl," he replied.

Trent asked him, "Were do you stay, when you're on the road?"

Steve said, "I got into town late and the two motels here about are booked solid, so I'll have place down the road."

Trent saw this as a big opening to his plan. I could see the light go on over his head. After o was starting to feel tipsy. Then Trent said, "Hell Steve, you seem like a nice guy. We have a at our house. You're welcome to it if you would like."

The three drinks that I had were making Steve look pretty good. As I saw him eyeing me up sure you wouldn't mind?"

Trent answered for both of us, "Hell no, we don't mind. I'm getting a little sleepy myself and to get out of here. How about you honey?"

I looked at him and knew right where this was going and said, "Yes I'm getting tired myself, p

We all laughed and Trent said, "Okay it's a deal let's get out of here."

As we were leaving Steve said, "I'll follow you in my car."

Trent said, "Okay, no problem."

Chapter Three - You can't be Serious

Two weeks later Trent asked if I would like to do some teasing again that Friday night.

This time I was all up for it and said, "Sure, I was hoping you'd want to do it again."

Trent said, "Fuck yes, but let's go to a nice place for drinks this time. Mo-Joes is really a dun Reluctantly, he dropped my dress back down and got up. He then said, "God Megan, some crazy trying to get into you tonight."

I gave him a kiss and said, "He can try all he likes but you're the one that's going to get it."

We had a nice dinner then took off for the Zone. We got there and, of course, there was a lir got in line and were told it could take up to an hour to get in the door. After a long time we st about going to some other place.

Just then some guy that Trent works with came out of the bar and walked right past us. Tren Jack!"

Jack stopped and turn around then came back to talk to us in line. He said, "Hey what's up T doing here? Does your wife know you have some hot little thing out on a date tonight?"

We all laughed and Trent introduced me to Jack. Jack then told us that he and a friend had a two extra seats. He knew the doorman, and maybe he could get him to let us slip in the side to his car to get his phone and he would be right back.

About five minutes later the doorman let us in the side-door along with Jack. We made our w Jack's friend was waiting. Trent and I were astounded as his friend turned out to be my own for fun and games tonight I thought.

The place had a DJ that was playing some great dance tunes. Both Dad and Jack asked Tre dance with me. Trent laughed and said I had a mind of my own, and if I wanted to dance wit with him.

I ended up taking turns dancing with all three of them. They kept buying me drinks and I was a real buzz.

After Jack got a call from his girlfriend, he told us it was nice spending time with us, but that

We sat at the table talking and soon the conversation turned to football of all things. Dad and talking about last week's game. Who did this and who did that. It was just boring to me.

Then Trent said, "I have the game on tape if you would like to see it."

Dad said, "No-way! Maybe I'll come over tomorrow and watch it."

Dad and Trent had both been doing shots. I told Trent once to take it easy on the booze bec

He said he was fine and did another shot.

Dad killed his drink and said, "Okay, fine let's go."

We all got up and walked out to the parking lot together. Trent said, "Why don't you just follo

Dad said, "Okay, will-do," as we got in our cars and started home.

I asked Trent, "Why are you fighting with him over this stupid game?"

Trent smiled and said, "I didn't know any other way to get him to the house tonight."

The alcohol had me thinking a little slow, and then it hit me. "Oh god no! My Dad is our victi

"Duh, yes! Why else would I have him over at this time of night?" Trent replied.

"You can't be serious? Not my father?"

"It's just teasing, Megan." Trent stated matter-of-factly.

Then I realized how agitated Trent had become. He seemed to be genuinely turned on by th Dad like we had done to Steve. I thought about teasing my own father and realized it might squirm a little bit, besides, it was just for fun. I was raised by my mother so he was not very

"Your Dad got a hard-on?" Trent asked. "How do you know that?"

"Because he was rubbing it against my leg as we danced, I could feel it through his pants."

As we drove, Trent pulled the crotch of my little panties to the side and sank his finger deep

"He really did," I continued the white-lie as I moved my hips to Trent's slow finger-fucking. It

As we pulled in our driveway I asked if this was the same plan as last time.

Trent said, "Yeah, I'll act like I'm sleeping and wake up to save the day if your Dad goes too

He paused, pondering something significant, then continued, "But Megan, you may need to to get things going, I doubt if he will initiate anything with his own daughter."

I gave him a kiss before we got out of the car. I was really anxious.

Once in the house Trent put on this football video and asked if anybody wanted a beer.

I said, "No thanks, I'm way over my limit." And I was. I could feel things spinning around whe eyes. I knew Trent was well over his limit too. As he got Dad and himself a beer, I gave him looks that only a wife can.

He looked at me with a "what?" expression as he sat down in his Lazy-Boy.

Dad and I were sitting on opposite ends of the couch. I curled my legs under me as I sat the dress ride up over my stocking top on the side giving Dad what I hoped was a good view of

Dad looked over at me and said, "You don't like football very much do you?"

"No I don't," I replied, "but Trent loves it. My problem is I don't understand what's going on."

Dad then said, "Well, it doesn't look like Trent likes it much either."

I looked over at Trent and he looked like he was passed out with his beer still in his hand. I l said, "Well he didn't last long tonight."

I moved over a little closer to Dad and said, "It looks like I won't be getting any tonight; when out he's dead to the world."

He smiled and said, "I think you're right."

Moving even closer to Dad, I said, "That's a shame; I got all dressed up – all hot and sexy – passes out on me."

By now I was right next to Dad. I picked up Dad's hand and placed it on my knee and leaned shoulder. I was thinking we would just cuddle, nothing more.

Dad fidgeted as he seemed to adjust his position next to me. I looked at him without removin

Dad said, "Megan, you look wonderful tonight."

I thanked him and told him how much it meant to be appreciated. I gently kissed his cheek, v that Trent would see this and stop it.

Dad broke the kiss and asked me if I would like to go somewhere more comfortable.

I hit him on the arm in jest and said, "No, I can't do that. You're my father."

"How about we take a ride over to my house? Trent will never know and I'll bring you back b

Again I told him no, that I wasn't going anyplace.

Dad said, "Fine I like it here on the couch anyway," and went back to kissing me.

By now one hand was playing with my left breast and the other made it up under my dress t my stockings. As his hand was rubbing my leg just inches from my crotch he came across th belt that was holding my stockings up.

He broke the kiss again and asked me if I was wearing a garter belt.

Just then Dad moved his finger right up to the wet crotch of my little panties.

I looked at Trent one more time for help. He was still just sitting there with that big smile on h

"Come on Megan, nobody will know. Trent's passed out, please let me fuck you. I need it so

I looked at him and said, "Please don't Dad; I've never cheated on Trent before."

Dad then said, "Okay, how about I just rub my cock up and down your pussy and not stick it until I come, is that okay?"

Thinking this was a way out, I shook my head yes and said, "Okay if you have to, that's fine but please, nothing more."

I just about exploded when Dad laid the bottom of his hard cock right down on my wet pussy his cock could slide up and down my slit very easily.

Very slowly Dad began rocking his hips; sliding his cock up and down my pussy lips. With ea the bottom of his cock was rubbing my clit. Oh god it felt SO good! His cock sank in between they wrapped about half way around his cock as he slid his penis through the crevice of my head of his cock moved up deep in my pussy lips and would pop out right below my clit. The on up rubbing my clit that felt so wonderful.

Dad moaned, "Oh Megan your pussy is so hot and wet."

The way his hot hard cock was rubbing on my clit I knew he was going to have me cumming one had ever assaulted me sexually the way Dad was now doing. Wow, did it feel good.

I soon felt yet another orgasm starting deep inside my body. I was moaning, "Oh yes!" as I s pumping in time with Dad's hot cock, Dad picked up the tempo accordingly.

As my orgasm was building, I was rocking my hips and pussy faster and faster on Dad's coc I felt myself cumming for a third time. I pulled my hips down and rolled them up to get his ha my clit really hard as I was cumming.

But then something I hadn't planned on happened. As I pushed up I felt Dad's hot cock sink I pulled away to get it out, he pushed in deeper. Then my orgasm hit me and I was helpless out a loud, "Dad!" as I pushed up to his hard cock and it sank deep inside me again – I start

Trent then gave me one of those looks and asked, "Did you actually try to seduce him?"

"It doesn't matter, all that matters is that we still love each other." I insisted.

"I've got to know, did you try to seduce your Dad?"

Thinking for a second before I answered, I lied and said, "Of course not! Why is it so importa Trent gave me a hug and said, "Well... I was worried we went too far. We were really drunk

I realized then and there that the truth would have really fucked up our relationship.

Chapter Four - Keeping Secrets

Well my story doesn't end there. As it turns out, about six weeks after my wild night with Dad to my doctor. The news I got from her floored me, I was pregnant. And the date of conceptio was in the ballpark of my night with Dad. I knew right then that I had Dad's baby growing ins didn't know was what I was going to tell Trent.

So the next day I told Trent that I was only three weeks pregnant. Eight months later when t up I told Trent that the birth was premature.

Trent just loves the baby and as far as I know he thinks it's his. I can see Dad's eyes in the b it was Dad's sperm that made its way to my egg.

Our baby was three months old now and we hadn't played our game since the night Dad imp had begun to drop hints about starting up again. I wasn't so sure after the outcome from our and told him it was just too soon to begin again.

I was relaxing at home one morning when a text message popped up on my cell phone, Dad message. I don't know why, but my heart suddenly started racing. I read the text with some

"What's up?"

"Just relaxing. How're you?"

"Fine," he replied.

And then I froze. I didn't know what to say. Even though we weren't exactly face-to-face, it d might think of me.

"How's work?"

"Just fine," he said.

I can't say for sure, but he seemed to be having the same sense of unease, as I was.

Typically, we never talked on the phone or texted; it was usually just email between us. But obvious that something was different now.

Dad asked, "How's your sex life?"

I couldn't believe he was so bold, "That's none of your business!" I replied. But then, as a tau

"You wish!" I typed.

There was a pause, and then Dad asked, "Do you have a camera phone?"

"Yeah, of course."

Dad paused, and then texted. "Send me a picture of you."

My heart began racing again as I replied, "Ok."

I turned my camera phone around and with a shaking hand, and angled the camera lens tow

As I thought of what to say next Dad typed, "You heard of sexting?"

"I know what it is."

Dad typed back quickly, "Want to play?"

I began typing. "Still there?" I asked. I waited for a reply, and when it finally arrived, I sighed

"Yes," he said.

I pushed one hand back down my shorts and very awkwardly typed with the other. "You exc

"Yes," came a quick reply.

"Want me to see me naked?" I asked.

There was a pause, and then he said "Yes."

Had it been any other guy, I would never tease like this, instead I hurriedly pushed my short

Then I turned the mirror so that it faced the corner of the bed. I then sat down on the edge o spreading my legs and pushing my ass forward a bit so the mirror could show more.

Now my body had gone into autopilot. It wasn't my father, any longer, but simply a fantasy g

A devilish grin grew across my face and I leaned back, pushing my knees apart and lewdly p

"Yes!" he replied.

I glanced up at the mirror and smiled. Then he asked if I was going to cum soon.

"YES" I said.

"Me too," He typed.

Then I leaned back and brought myself to orgasm, writhing in my bed, groaning loudly and h

When I had finally caught my breath, I smiled up at the mirror and winked at myself, wiping a brow. I picked up my phone and asked Dad if he had cum.

"Hell yes!" came his speedy reply.

I laughed, typing back, "That was fun!"

He started typing, but then I realized it was going to get creepy if I didn't do something. "I be cleaned up," I said.

"You going to be around tomorrow?" He asked.

I typed back saying probably the same time, and he said that would work for him, too. "See

The next morning, I rushed around the bedroom, trying to find something a bit sexier to wea

"Can you lick your nipples?" he asked.

"What?" I sent back to him, but then I chuckled and looked up at the mirror, sat back and sc

"Wow!" he responded.

I laughed, replying, "Well, I'm still lactating!"

Dad laughed once again and said he thought they were sexy.

"That's better," I typed with a chuckle. I let one hand drop between my legs, and then asked hard.

"Been hard for a while!" he said.

"Mmm," I replied. "Wish I could see that!"

Just then, my stomach fluttered. The words simply came out on their own, but now that I tho really wasn't opposed to the idea. My fingers slipped across my wet clit, sending a gentle sp

When my phone chirped this time a picture of my Dad's erect penis filled the screen, with a t

I looked up at the camera and nodded, smiling dreamily. Then I brought my hand to my mou fingers, snapping the picture as I did.

"How's it taste?" he asked.

"Mmm," I replied. "Delicious!"

"You like tasting yourself?"

Once more, I looked at the mirror and grinned, licking my fingers seductively for him, snappi

"I'd love to taste you," he said.

I slumped back in my chair and groaned loudly, spreading my legs wide. I was getting close my delirium, asked if he would jack off for me?

"YES!" he exclaimed.

Teetering on the brink of orgasm and barely capable of typing, I hastily replied, "I'd love to fe my mouth." Then, just before it struck home, I added, "I'd swallow for you."

That's when my orgasm took over. I managed to have a moment of clarity in thought, and qu

I smiled and threw my head back, holding my legs out wide. When my orgasm finally subsid

My phone was chiming incessantly from the received texts.

"Fuck!" The first message from him said.

"That was great!" was another.

I managed a weak grin and tried to raise my hand to text. Just as I started typing, Dad sent your pussy wet?"

I chuckled and typed, "Want to see for yourself?" I asked.

"YES!" he replied eagerly.

I leaned back, and then angled the camera, trying to hold it steady, as I brought it down. I pu the bed, slowly bringing the camera down and angling it up so he could get a good view betw my free hand, I spread myself open for him, and snapped.

"Megan you're beautiful."

With the camera still down there, I slipped my index finger inside me and snapped a picture

"Yummy," he said.

I carefully raised the camera, pointing it at the mirror, and then looked directly at it and smile my index finger in my mouth and took a picture.

Then, once again without any forethought, I typed, "Wish your hot cock was inside me?" I hi remembered to whom I had said that. "... oh damn..." I mumbled.

To my relief, Dad just sent an emoticon winking in reply. Still, I felt like perhaps I'd gone a bi saying that in our little texting game.

We chatted for a few more minutes, and once in a while, I'd let one of my hands slide across pausing for a moment to pull on the nipple, touching myself while I texted with my father.

Before our little session of erotic fun ended, he once again complimented me on my looks. I blush and thanked him.

For the next two weeks, we'd make it a habit of sexting during the day. And our conversation

And another strange benefit was that it made me much more sexually aroused by the time T

We got a sitter for the baby and went to dinner. We hadn't really made plans, other than that Trent suggested that she come over after work for a nightcap. I shot him a terse look, but the would be for just one drink, as she had had a long day.

"Great," Trent exclaimed, and we went to wait for her in the parking lot.

"How's this going to work?" I asked Trent.

"Just see where it goes." He said

Then I got the impression that maybe he thought he was going to get lucky too. "Are you exp

"The thought hadn't crossed my mind." He replied.

She followed us home and we were soon drinking and chatting in our living room. Right on c

I walked into the kitchen and she followed. I placed my drink on the counter, took a seat at th that held my hair back. Marsha's presence was intoxicating. I felt a drop of moisture drip ont

"I'm attracted to you, too." I replied dreamily.

Is this really happening? I couldn't help musing. I felt my heart thump rapidly behind my rib c

I smiled at Marsha's sudden intake of breath when she saw the white lacy garte tan hose. I always made sure I wore the sexiest undergarments I could find. "You are so beautiful." Marsha murmured as she leaned in to sprinkle wispy butterfly kisses thighs. I lay back against the cold table and leaned into the pleasure that was slowly overtak my pelvis towards Marsha's face, eager to feel her tongue inside my most intimate folds. Bu prolong the seduction. She nuzzled my buttocks and thighs with her nose, alternately licking from my knees to my ass. After what seemed like hours, she ran her index finger under the G-string, and proceeded to pull the flimsy material down the length of my legs.

"Oh, God....." I moaned when I felt the first contact of Marsha's tongue against my pussy. Th of her mouth suckling my lips and clit was almost more than I could take. I could not rememb pleasure with such intensity. A weak tingling wave swirled around my pelvis like a hurricane, gathering strength before re the rest of me, from the top of my head to the tips of my toes. I struggled to relax my thighs a them around Marsha's head, suffocating her as she worked.

Marsha ate me like a gourmet, enjoying every flavor, every fold of my pink pussy. The stroke varied, some long and intense, like painting a fence, some short and precise. Holding the fabric of Marsha's black panties to the side, I dove into her center. The smells, t

Marsha rolled her head from side to side, moaning, as she allowed the movement of her hip of her essence.

"Oh, I...I." Marsha cried, grabbing my ears. Our souls were one, each melting into the other

And then she lost it. Marsha's orgasm was more violent than mine had been. It shook her bo

Time stood still at that moment. We lay entwined in the kitchen, aware of only each other, a

As though in a dream, my hands began to massage my breasts, trapping the warmly trembli

The moaning from within the living room was almost incoherent now as Marsha's head bobb

For the first time I watched as my husband was pleasured by another woman, the salacious

I moved my feet farther apart on the ground and pressed my fingers harder, the middle finge

The obscene thought struck me that perhaps Trent knew what I was up to, and I felt the drea

The thought that, no, this was horrible, I should stop them, again floated through my conscio

"Yes, oh yes!" Trent panted.

I could see Trent's glistening penis ramming its way into Marsha's hotly sucking mouth, sink softly waving lips like a greased telephone pole.

I realized that this was a moment to be shared with my lover and my husband, so I strutted i with my lover.

After Marsha had gone, Trent and I made long languorous love as we recalled the wonderfu evening. Trent had quietly watched as Marsha and I made love in the kitchen. He said it was thing he had ever seen.

I asked if he liked the blow job she had given him.

"Oh, baby, that was her idea." He said pleading his case.

I laughed and told him, "It's alright baby, you deserved a little loving."

"A little loving?"

"Well, maybe we can work up to something more, if you think you can handle it." I said, teas

A few weeks went by and Trent asked me if I wanted another child. I had been thinking of it

"It's settled then, we'll start tonight!" He exclaimed.

Two months later we were still trying. I recalled how Trent was unable to impregnate me the

After masturbating with Dad one day, I mentioned that we were trying to get pregnant and w

"Who's the father of your child?" he typed.

Oh shit, I thought, now I've done it. I thought of what to say, but the long pause raised Dad's

He was right. What were we to do?

When my husband and I had sex that night, I couldn't help but think of it as a form of penanc wasn't quite sure what to make of it. I loved Dad, as much as Trent and I wanted to spend th

Monday morning, after Trent had left for work, I stood in the shower staring down at the floor spraying against me, running down over my neck and shoulders and cascading over my bre

I closed my eyes and very soon a hand drifted between my legs, as my mind meandered ba Dad.

I was on my back, when Dad slipped his cock into me. And the cause of my utter shock was my Dad was fucking me, but also in that I found myself enjoying it. I remembered how I felt me, and later as I was begging him to fuck me harder and empty himself in my body. And I r wonderful it felt; the intense tingling between my legs and throbbing inside my vagina, as his

When I finally stepped out of the shower, I quickly dried myself and walked to the bedroom a

For the next two days, I didn't text with Dad. I was too afraid to talk to him. Thoughts of him

"It's for you."

I was in the kitchen washing dishes, having just finished dinner, when Trent called to me. I w feet.

"I'll, uh... take it in the den," I said.

Trent grinned and nodded.

A minute later, I picked up the extension phone in the den and, covering the mouthpiece, ca heart was pounding and I cleared my throat.

"You there?" he said.

"Yeah," I squeaked softly. "I'm here."

There was a brief pause and he asked how I was.

"Um... fine. I'm fine. How're you?"

Dad chuckled. "I'm alright. You don't sound fine," he replied. "You haven't replied to my texts if you were okay."

"Yeah... yeah, I'm fine. I'm okay."

There was another pause, and then we both went to speak at the same time.

"Sorry, you go first," I said timidly.

"Nah, go on," he replied.

I smiled, turning to sit in my chair, and held the phone close to my ear with both hands.

"I'm okay," I whispered.

"You sure?"

"Yeah."

We were both silent for a moment, and then Dad spoke.

"I miss you," he said softly.

I closed my eyes and gripped the phone tightly, as my heart began throbbing again. Then I s

"Are you upset?" he asked.

I smiled. "No," I said. "Not at all... I miss you, too."

Then I heard Dad breathing heavily, the same sound I heard when he was on top of me. I be breathing hard on my own.

"I really miss our time together," he mumbled almost seductively.

I sucked in deeply through my nose and sighed.

"God, I miss you, too," I whispered.

We were both quiet and breathing hard, and, though separated by distance, our hormones b

"Fuck," he sighed. "I'm so hard for you right now."

I put a hand between my legs and closed my knees tightly, breathing heavily.

"... wish you were here," he mumbled softly.

I pressed a finger against my vagina and moaned.

"... you want me?" he asked.

My jaw hung open, as I envisioned him stroking his long hard cock for me; visions of my boc

"... yeah..." I stuttered.

"God, I miss our little game..."

"... Oh yeah," I sighed, scraping a finger between my legs against the fabric of my shorts, se

"When can we play again?" he whispered.

"... God, I want to so badly..."

"When?"

Neither of us spoke as I let Dad in. We knew why he was there and the tension was thick as

"Then you'll love this." I then perched one leg up on the inside ledge of the shower, and guid once again. Dad dipped at the knees and began thrusting up into me, gently at first, then pic until he rammed into me to the point that I began to worry that I might slip and fall. ÉÍÍÍ

Two thousand five hundred and fifty-three years ago, the Omniscient Buddha delivered His first sermon to his five old associates in the Deer Park near Baranasi.

The essence of the sermon is found in a short stanza in the Dhammapada.

> Not to do any evil,
> To cultivate good,
> To purify one's mind,
> This is the exhortation of the Buddhas.

These virtues are prescribed by the Buddha. They are indispensable for man to live in peace and happiness. Buddhism lays stress upon virtues more than any other religion. Buddhist virtues convey much deeper sense than elsewhere.

Purification of mind based on avoiding evil and cultivating good leads not only to a good and happy life but to Nibbana. To purify one's mind is to get rid of the defilements of greed, hatred and ignorance which are the main roots of all evils. One who has perfectly purified one's mind attains ultimate peace.

The Blazing World

The world today is, however, blazing with the fires of greed, hatred, ignorance, conceit, jealousy, and so forth. Conflicts, therefore, prevail everywhere. Wars break out frequently in one or the other part of the world. Man is not at all in peace and security. He is always worrying about peace and security in his life. He finds little consolation under the circumstances. Such a situation is created by mental impurity of individuals and can never be rectified by either science or psychotherapy.

Dr. Fromm, a philosopher and psychoanalyst, says, "Our contemporary Western society, in spite of its material, intellectual and political progress, is increasingly less conducive to mental health and tends to undermine the inner security, happiness, reason and the capacity for love in the individual."

Obviously, what is true of Western society is no less true of mankind in general.

Inner Purity Needed

The individual who has no inner purity and peace with himself cannot be in peace with the world. So long as there is no purity and peace within, inner conflicts will never cease. This situation can never be done away with by science.

Inevitably, we now realize that absolute purity within is a vital need for man to achieve both inward and outward peace and security.

How, then, shall we achieve this absolute purity of mind?

The Middle Way Discovered by the Buddha

The Compassionate Buddha gave a very clear answer to that question, and briefly explained in His first sermon the Noble Eightfold Path as the Middle Way leading to Nibbana where all the defilements are purified and eternal peace attained.

To know how he discovered this Middle Way, let us have a glance into the past.

In the second half of the sixth century B.C., Prince Siddhartha, the son of King Suddhodana of Sakyan clan, renounced the household-life where he enjoyed the extreme worldly pleasure and went into voluntary exile in search of the true way out from suffering. He practised meditation under Alara and Udaka, the two foremost ascetic teachers, and reached the highest meditative attainment possible thereby. It, however, did not satisfy him as it is not enough for release from suffering.

He, then, spent almost six years in the practice of asceticism, trying every sort of self-mortification. This, too, failed.

Now, realizing the futility of the extreme self-mortification, he gave it up and practised the contemplation of breathing with balanced effort. At last he succeeded in discovering the Middle Way he had sought for so long, and attained Buddhahood.

At first it occurred to Him that the Dhamma he had discovered was profound, difficult to perceive, subtle, no mere dialectic, intelligible to the wise, and that these beings were steeped in ignorance, craving and hatred. He, therefore, hesitated to preach. However, at the second thought he realized that there were beings who have little dust in their wisdom-eyes and who could understand His Dhamma if they listened to it.

He, therefore, resolved to preach and went to the Deer Park near Baranasi where His former associates, a group of five ascetics, lived. There did he deliver His first sermon on the Full Moon Day of Asalhi or Warso as we say in Burmese.

Here is His first sermon, the Discourse on Setting in motion the Wheel of Dhamma.

The First Sermon

Dhamma-cakkappavattana Sutta

These two extremes, Bhikkhus, are not to be practised by one who has gone forth from the household-life. What are the two?

One is indulgence in the objects of sensual desire, which is base, vulgar, worldly, ignoble and unprofitable, and the other is self-mortification, which is painful, ignoble and unprofitable.

The Middle Way discovered by the Tathagata avoids the two extremes. It gives insight, it gives knowledge; it leads to peace, higher wisdom, enlightenment and Nibbana. What is that Middle Way?

The Four Noble Truths

Now, suffering, as a noble truth, is this: Birth is suffering, decay is suffering, sickness is suffering, death is suffering, to be in contact with things which one dislikes is suffering, to be separated from things which one likes is suffering; in short - the five aggregates of grasping are suffering.

The origin of suffering, as a noble truth, is this: It is craving that produces rebirth of beings, accompanied by enjoyment and lust, enjoying this and that: namely, craving for sensual desire, craving for eternal existence and craving for non-existence.

The Buddha further explained the three phases of each of the Four Noble Truths as follows:-

"The Noble Truth of suffering is this:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of suffering is to be realized:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of suffering has been thoroughly realized:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Origin of suffering is this:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Origin of suffering is to be exterminated:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Origin of suffering has been exterminated:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Cessation of suffering is this:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Cessation of suffering is to be experienced:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Cessation of suffering has been experienced:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Way Leading to the Cessation of suffering is this:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Way Leading to the Cessation of suffering is to be developed:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

"The Noble Truth of the Way Leading to the Cessation of suffering has been developed:" such was the insight, the understanding, the knowledge, the wisdom, and the light that arose in me in regard to Dhamma unheard of before.

Thus the Buddha explained the three phases of each Noble Truth. Then, He continued as follows:-

So long as my knowing and seeing things as they really are was not quite purified in these twelve aspects - in these three phases of each of the Four Noble Truths - I did not claim to have discovered the Supreme Enlightenment in this world with the Devas, Maras, Brahmas and men including recluses and Brahmins.

Only when my knowing and seeing things as they really are was quite purified in these twelve aspects - in these three phases of each of the Four Noble Truths - I did claim to have discovered the Supreme Enlightenment in this world with the Devas, Maras, Brahmas and men including recluses and Brahmins.

Now, knowledge and insight have arisen in me. My heart's deliverance is unassailable. This is my last birth.
There is no more becoming for me.

Realization

During this sermon, there arose in the Venerable Kondanna the spotless, immaculate knowledge of the Truth: "Whatever arises is subject to cessation."

In the following nights, the Venerable Vappa, Baddiya, Mahanama and Assaji, the other four old associates, realized the Truth, having fully developed the Noble Eightfold Path.

This first sermon is the fundamental doctrine of Buddhism from which all the teaching of the Buddha spreads out and to which all points back.

The Buddha preached many other sermons in the course of 45 years in order to meet individuals' necessity, but they all have the same essence as the first sermon. The essence is the Four Noble Truths. The relation among these Four Noble Truths is as follows:-

All component things are suffering. This suffering is caused by craving. This craving must be eradicated in order to reach the state where there is no suffering by developing the Noble Eightfold Path.

This Noble Eightfold Path is the Middle Way which purifies one's mind and leads one to eternal peace of Nibbana.

May you all be blessed with peace and bliss:

May you all realize the Truth and attain Enlightenment and Nibbana.

Sadhu! Sadhu! Sadhu!

Crossing the Wilderness

Jataka No. 1

While the Buddha was staying at Jetavana Monastery near Savatthi, the wealthy banker, Anathapindika, went one day to pay his respects. His servants carried masses of flowers, perfume, butter, oil, honey, molasses, cloths, and robes. Anathapindika paid obeisance to the Buddha, presented the offerings he had brought, and sat down respectfully. At that time, Anathapindika was accompanied by five hundred friends who were followers of heretical teachers. His friends also paid their respects to the Buddha and sat close to the banker. The Buddha's face appeared like a full moon, and his body was surrounded by a radiant aura. Seated on the red stone seat, he was like a young lion roaring with a clear, noble voice as he taught them a discourse full of sweetness and beautiful to the ear.

After hearing the Buddha's teaching, the five hundred gave up their heretical practices and took refuge in the Triple Gem: the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Sangha. After that, they went regularly with Anathapindika to offer flowers and incense and to hear the teaching. They gave liberally, kept the precepts, and faithfully observed the Uposatha Day.[*] Soon after the Buddha left Savatthi to return to Rajagaha, however, these men abandoned their new faith and reverted to their previous beliefs.

Seven or eight months later, the Buddha returned to Jetavana. Again, Anathapindika brought these friends to visit the Buddha. They paid their respects, but Anathapindika explained that they had forsaken their refuge and had resumed their original practices.

The Buddha asked, "Is it true that you have abandoned refuge in the Triple Gem for refuge in other doctrines?" The Buddha's voice was incredibly clear because throughout myriad aeons He had always spoken truthfully.

When these men heard it, they were unable to conceal the truth. "Yes, Blessed One," they confessed. "It is true."

"Disciples," the Buddha said "nowhere between the lowest of hells below and the highest heaven above, nowhere in all the infinite worlds that stretch right and left, is there the equal, much less the superior, of a Buddha. Incalculable is the excellence which springs from obeying the Precepts and from other virtuous conduct."

Then he declared the virtues of the Triple Gem. "By taking refuge in the Triple Gem," He told them, "one escapes from rebirth in states of suffering." He further explained that meditation on the Triple Gem leads through the four stages to Enlightenment.

"In forsaking such a refuge as this," he admonished them, "you have certainly erred. In the past, too, men who foolishly mistook what was no refuge for a real refuge, met disaster. Actually, they fell prey to yakkhas -- evil spirits -- in the wilderness and were utterly destroyed. In contrast, men who clung to the truth not only survived, but actually prospered in that same wilderness."

Anathapindika raised his clasped hands to his forehead, praised the the Buddha, and asked him to tell that story of the past.

"In order to dispel the world's ignorance and to conquer suffering," the Buddha proclaimed, "I practised the Ten Perfections for countless aeons. Listen carefully, and I will speak."

Having their full attention, the Buddha made clear, as though he were releasing the full moon from behind clouds, what rebirth had concealed from them.

Long, long ago, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Baranasi, the Bodhisatta was born into a merchant's family and grew up to be a wise trader. At the same time, in the same city, there was another merchant, a very stupid fellow, with no common sense whatsoever.

One day it so happened that the two merchants each loaded five hundred carts with costly wares of Baranasi and prepared to leave in the same direction at exactly the same time. The wise merchant thought, "If this silly young fool travels with me and if our thousand carts stay together, it will be too much for the road. Finding wood and water for the men will be difficult, and there won't be enough grass for the oxen. Either he or I must go first."

"Look," he said to the other merchant, "the two of us can't travel together. Would you rather go first or follow after me?"

The foolish trader thought, "There will be many advantages if I take the lead. I'll get a road which is not yet cut up. My oxen will have the pick of the grass. My men will get the choicest wild herbs for curry. The water will be undisturbed. Best of all, I'll be able to fix my own price for bartering my goods." Considering all these advantages, he said, "I will go ahead of you, my friend."

The Bodhisatta was pleased to hear this because he saw many advantages in following after. He reasoned, "Those carts going first will level the road where it is rough, and I'll be able to travel along the road they have already smoothed. Their oxen will graze off the coarse old grass, and mine will pasture on the sweet young growth which will spring up in its place. My men will find fresh sweet herbs for curry where the old ones have been picked. Where there is no water, the first caravan will have to dig to supply themselves, and we'll be able to drink at the wells they have dug. Haggling over prices is tiring work; he'll do the work, and I will be able to barter my wares at prices he has already fixed."

"Very well, my friend," he said, "please go first."

"I will," said the foolish merchant, and he yoked his carts and set out. After a while he came to the outskirts of a wilderness. He filled all of his huge water jars with water before setting out to cross the sixty yojanas [*] of desert which lay before him.

The yakkha who haunted that wilderness had been watching the caravan. When it had reached the middle, he used his magic power to conjure up a lovely carriage drawn by pure white young bulls. With a retinue of a dozen disguised yakkhas carrying swords and shields, he rode along in his carriage like a mighty lord. His hair and clothes were wet, and he had a wreath of blue lotuses and white water lilies around his head. His attendants also were dripping wet and draped in garlands. Even the bulls' hooves and carriage wheels were muddy.

As the wind was blowing from the front, the merchant was riding at the head of his caravan to escape the dust. The yakkha drew his carriage beside the merchant's and greeted him kindly. The merchant returned the greeting and moved his own carriage to one side to allow the carts to pass while he and the yakkha chatted.

"We are on our way from Baranasi, sir," explained the merchant. "I see that your men are all wet and muddy and that you have lotuses and water lilies. Did it rain while you were on the road? Did you come across pools with lotuses and water lilies?"

"What do you mean?" the yakkha exclaimed. "Over there is the dark-green streak of a jungle. Beyond that there is plenty of water. It is always raining there, and there are many lakes with lotuses and water lilies." Then, pretending to be interested in the merchant's business, he asked, "What do you have in these carts?"

"Expensive merchandise," answered the merchant.

"What is in this cart which seems so heavily laden?" the yakkha asked as the last cart rolled by.

"That's full of water."

"You were wise to carry water with you this far, but there is no need for it now, since water is so abundant ahead. You could travel much faster and lighter without those heavy jars. You'd be better off breaking them and throwing the water away. Well, good day," he said suddenly, as he turned his carriage. "We must be on our way. We have stopped too long already." He rode away quickly with his men. As soon as they were out of sight, he turned and made his way back to his own city.

The merchant was so foolish that he followed the yakkha's advice. He broke all the jars, without saving even a single cupful of water, and ordered the men to drive on quickly. Of course, they did not find any water, and they were soon exhausted from thirst. At sunset they drew their carts into a circle and tethered the oxen to the wheels, but there was no water for the weary animals. Without water, the men could not cook any rice either. They sank to the ground and fell asleep. As soon as night came, the yakkhas attacked, killing every single man and beast. The fiends devoured the flesh, leaving only the bones, and departed. Skeletons were strewn in every direction, but the five hundred carts stood with their loads untouched. Thus the heedless young merchant was the sole cause of the destruction of the entire caravan.

Allowing six weeks to pass after the foolish trader had left, the Bodhisatta set out with his five hundred carts. When he reached the edge of the wilderness, he filled his water jars. Then he assembled his men and announced, "Let not so much as a handful of water be used without my permission. Furthermore, there are poisonous plants in this wilderness. Do not eat any leaf, flower, or fruit which you have never eaten before, without showing it to me first." Having thus carefully warned his men, he led the caravan into the wilderness.

When they had reached the middle of the wilderness, the yakkha appeared on the path just as before. The merchant noticed his red eyes and fearless manner and suspected something strange. "I know there is no water in this desert," he said to himself. "Furthermore, this stranger casts no shadow. He must be a yakkha. He probably tricked the foolish merchant, but he doesn't realize how clever I am."

"Get out of here!" he shouted at the yakkha. "We are men of business. We do not throw away our water before we see where more is to come from!"

Without saying any more, the yakkha rode away.

As soon as the yakkhas had left, the merchant's men approached their leader and said, "Sir, those men were wearing lotuses and water lilies on their heads. Their clothes and hair were wringing wet. They told us that up ahead there is a thick forest where it is always raining. Let us throw away our water so that we can proceed quicker with lightened carts."

The merchant ordered a halt and summoned all his men. "Has any man among you ever heard before today," he asked, "that there was a lake or a pool in this wilderness?"

"No, sir," they answered. "It's known as the 'Waterless Desert.' "

"We have just been told by some strangers that it is raining in the forest just ahead. How far does a rain-wind carry?"

"A yojana, sir."

"Has any man here seen the top of even a single storm-cloud?"

"No, sir."

"How far off can you see a flash of lightning?"

"Four or five yojanas, sir."

"Has any man here seen a flash of lightning?"

"No, sir."

"How far off can a man hear a peal of thunder?"

"Two or three yojanas, sir."

"Has any man here heard a peal of thunder?"

"No, sir."

"Those were not men, but yakkhas," the wise merchant told his men. "They are hoping that we will throw away our water. Then, when we are weak and faint, they will return to devour us. Since the young merchant who went before us was not a man of good sense, most likely he was fooled by them. We may expect to find his carts standing just as they were first loaded. We will probably see them today. Press on with all possible speed, without throwing away a drop of water!"

Just as the merchant had predicted, his caravan soon came upon the five hundred carts with the skeletons of men and oxen strewn in every direction. He ordered his men to arrange his carts in a fortified circle, to take care of the oxen, and to prepare an early supper for themselves. After the animals and men had all safely bedded down, the merchant and his foremen, swords in hand, stood guard all through the night.

At daybreak the merchant replaced his own weak carts for stronger ones and exchanged his own common goods for the most costly of the abandoned merchandise. When he arrived at his destination, he was able to barter his stock of wares at two or three times their value. He returned to his own city without losing a single man out of all his company.

This story ended, the Buddha said, "Thus it was, laymen, that in times past, the foolish came to utter destruction, while those who clung to the truth escaped from the yakkhas' hands, reached their goal in safety, and returned to their homes again.

"This clinging to the truth not only endows happiness even up to rebirth in the Realm of Brahma,[*] but also leads ultimately to Arahatship. Following untruth entails rebirth either in the four states of punishment or in the lowest conditions of mankind." After the Buddha had expounded the Four Truths, those five hundred disciples were established in the Fruit of the First Path.

[*] The Realm of Brahma refers to the highest heavens, where beings enjoy radiant bliss.

The Buddha concluded his lesson by identifying the Birth as follows: "The foolish young merchant was Devadatta,[*] and his men were Devadatta's followers. The wise merchant's men were the followers of the Buddha, and I myself was that wise merchant."

[*] Devadatta was a cousin of the Buddha. He tried to kill the Master several times, but always failed. See Jataka No.3, immediately below.

Serivavanija Jataka
The Traders of Seriva

Jataka No. 3

So that a disheartened bhikkhu would have no regrets in the future, the Buddha told him this story at Savatthi to encourage him to persevere. "If you give up your practice in this sublime teaching which leads to Nibbana," the Buddha told him, "you will suffer long, like the trader of Seriva who lost a golden bowl worth a hundred thousand pieces."

When asked to explain, the Buddha told this story of the distant past.

Five long aeons ago, the Bodhisatta was an honest trader selling fancy goods in the kingdom of Seriva. Sometimes he travelled with another trader from the same kingdom, a greedy fellow, who handled the same wares.

One day the two of them crossed the Telavaha river to do business in the bustling city of Andhapura. As usual, to avoid competing with each other, they divided the city between them and began selling their goods from door to door.

In that city there was a ramshackle mansion. Years before the family had been rich merchants, but by the time of this story their fortunes had dwindled to nothing, and all the men of the family had died. The sole survivors were a girl and her grandmother, and these two earned their living by working for hire.

That afternoon, while the greedy peddler was on his rounds, he came to the door of that very house, crying, "Beads for sale! Beads for sale!"

When the young girl heard his cry, she begged, "Please buy me a trinket, Grandmother."

"We're very poor, dear. There's not a cent in the house and I can't think of anything to offer in exchange."

The girl suddenly remembered an old bowl. "Look!" she cried. "Here's an old bowl. It's of no use to us. Let's try to trade it for something nice."

What the little girl showed her grandmother was an old bowl which had been used by the great merchant, the late head of the family. He had always eaten his curries served from this beautiful, expensive bowl. After his death it had been thrown among the pots and pans and forgotten. Since it hadn't been used for a very long time, it was completely covered with grime. The two women had no idea it was gold.

The old woman asked the trader to come in and sit down. She showed him the bowl and said, "Sir, my granddaughter would like a trinket. Would you be so kind as to take this bowl and give her something or other in exchange?"

The peddler took the bowl in his hand and turned it over. Suspecting its value, he scratched the back of it with a needle. After just one covert look, he knew for certain the bowl was real gold.

He sat there frowning and thinking until his greed got the better of him. At last he decided to try to get the bowl without giving the woman anything whatever for it. Pretending to be angry, he growled, "Why did you bring me this stupid bowl? It isn't worth half a cent!" He threw the bowl to the floor, got up, and stalked out of the house in apparent disgust.

Since it had been agreed between the two traders that the one might try the streets which the other had already covered, the honest peddler came later into that same street and appeared at the door of the house, crying, "Beads for sale!"

Once again the young girl made the same request of her grandmother, and the old woman replied, "My dear, the first peddler threw our bowl on the ground and stormed out of the house. What have we got left to offer?"

"Oh, but that trader was nasty, Grandmother. This one looks and sounds very kind. I think he will take it."

"All right, then. Call him in."

When the peddler came into the house, the two women gave him a seat and shyly put the bowl into his hands. Immediately recognizing that the bowl was gold, he said, "Mother, this bowl is worth a hundred thousand pieces of silver. I'm sorry but I don't have that much money."

Astonished at his words, the old woman said, "Sir, another peddler who came here a little while ago said that it was not worth half a cent. He got angry, threw it on the floor, and went away. If it wasn't valuable then, it must be because of your own goodness that the bowl has turned into gold. Please take it, and just give us something or other for it. We will be more than satisfied."

At that time the peddler had only five hundred pieces of silver and goods worth another five hundred. He gave everything to the women, asking only to keep his scales, his bag, and eight coins for his return fare. Of course, they were happy to agree. After profuse thanks on both sides, the trader hurried to the river with the golden bowl. He gave his eight coins to the boatman and got into the boat.

Not long after he had left, the greedy peddler returned to the house, giving the impression of having reluctantly reconsidered their offer. He asked them to bring out their bowl, saying he would give them something or other for it after all.

The old woman flew at him. "You scoundrel!" she cried. "You told us that our golden bowl was not worth even half a cent. Lucky for us, an honest trader came after you left and told us it was really worth a hundred thousand pieces of silver. He gave us a thousand for it and took it away, so you are too late!"

When the peddler heard this, an intense pain swept over him. "He robbed me! He robbed me!" he cried. "He got my golden bowl worth a hundred thousand!" He became hysterical and lost all control. Throwing down his money and merchandise, he tore off his shirt, grabbed the beam of his scales for a club, and ran to the riverside to catch the other trader.

By the time he got to the river, the boat was already in midstream. He shouted for the boat to return to shore, but the honest peddler, who had already paid, calmly told the ferryman to continue on.

The frustrated trader could only stand there on the river-bank and watch his rival escape with the bowl. The sight so infuriated him that a fierce hate swelled up inside him. His heart grew hot, and blood gushed from his mouth. Finally, his heart cracked like the mud at the bottom of a pond dried up by the sun. So intense was the unreasoning hatred which he developed against the other trader because of the golden bowl, that he perished then and there.

The honest trader returned to Seriva, where he lived a full life spent in charity and other good works, and passed away to fare according to his deserts.

When the Buddha finished this story, he identified himself as the honest trader, and Devadatta as the greedy trader. This was the beginning of the implacable grudge which Devadatta held against the Bodhisatta through innumerable lives.

Matakabhatta Jataka
The Goat That Laughed and Wept

Jataka No. 18

One day, while the Buddha was staying in Jetavana, some bhikkhus asked him if there was any benefit in sacrificing goats, sheep, and other animals as offerings for departed relatives.

"No, bhikkhus," replied the Buddha. "No good ever comes from taking life, not even when it is for the purpose of providing a Feast for the Dead." Then he told this story of the past.

Long, long ago, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Baranasi, a brahmin decided to offer a Feast for the Dead and bought a goat to sacrifice. "My boys," he said to his students, "take this goat down to the river, bathe it, brush it, hang a garland around its neck, give it some grain to eat, and bring it back."

"Yes, sir," they replied and led the goat to the river.

While they were grooming it, the goat started to laugh with a sound like a pot smashing. Then, just as strangely, it started to weep loudly.

The young students were amazed at this behavior. "Why did you suddenly laugh," they asked the goat, "and why do you now cry so loudly?"

"Repeat your question when we get back to your teacher," the goat answered.

The students hurriedly took the goat back to their master and told him what had happened at the river. Hearing the story, the master himself asked the goat why it had laughed and why it had wept.

"In times past, brahmin," the goat began, "I was a brahmin who taught the Vedas like you. I, too, sacrificed a goat as an offering for a Feast for the Dead. Because of killing that single goat, I have had my head cut off 499 times. I laughed aloud when I realized that this is my last birth as an animal to be sacrificed. Today I will be freed from my misery. On the other hand, I cried when I realized that, because of killing me, you, too, may be doomed to lose your head five hundred times. It was out of pity for you that I cried."

"Well, goat," said the brahmin, "in that case, I am not going to kill you."

"Brahmin!" exclaimed the goat. "Whether or not you kill me, I cannot escape death today."

"Don't worry," the brahmin assured the goat. "I will guard you."

"You don't understand," the goat told him. "Your protection is weak. The force of my evil deed is very strong."

The brahmin untied the goat and said to his students, "Don't allow anyone to harm this goat." They obediently followed the animal to protect it.

After the goat was freed, it began to graze. It stretched out its neck to reach the leaves on a bush growing near the top of a large rock. At that very instant a lightning bolt hit the rock, breaking off a sharp piece of stone which flew through the air and neatly cut off the goat's head. A crowd of people gathered around the dead goat and began to talk excitedly about the amazing accident.

A tree deva [*] had observed everything from the goat's purchase to its dramatic death, and drawing a lesson from the incident, admonished the crowd: "If people only knew that the penalty would be rebirth into sorrow, they would cease from taking life. A horrible doom awaits one who slays." With this explanation of the law of kamma the deva instilled in his listeners the fear of hell. The people were so frightened that they completely gave up the practice of animal sacrifices. The deva further instructed the people in the Precepts and urged them to do good.

[*] Devas are celestial beings, ranging from the highest gods to simple tree spirits.

Eventually, that deva passed away to fare according to his deserts. For several generations after that, people remained faithful to the Precepts and spent their lives in charity and meritorious works, so that many were reborn in the heavens.

The Buddha ended his lesson and identified the Birth by saying, "In those days I was that deva."

Kuhaka Jataka
The Straw Worth More Than Gold

Jataka No. 89

The Buddha told this story at Jetavana about a conniving bhikkhu, who was the source of much trouble to other bhikkhus.

Long, long ago, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Baranasi, a shifty ascetic with long, matted hair, lived near a certain little village. The landowner had built a modest hermitage in the forest for him, and daily provided him with excellent food in his own house.

The landowner had a great fear of robbers and decided that the safest course to protect his money was to hide it in an unlikely place. Believing the matted-haired ascetic to be a model of sainthood, he brought a hundred pieces of gold to the hermitage, buried them there, and asked the ascetic to keep watch over the treasure.

"There's no need to say more, sir, to a man like me who has renounced the world. We hermits never covet what belongs to others."

"That's wonderful," said the landowner, who went off with complete confidence in the hermit's protestations.

As soon as the landowner was out of sight, the ascetic chuckled to himself, "Why, there's enough here to last a man his whole life!"

Allowing a few days to elapse, the hermit dug up the gold and reburied it conveniently by the road. The following morning, after a meal of rice and succulent curries at the landowner's house, the ascetic said, "My good sir, I've been staying here, supported by you, for a long time. Frankly, living so long in one place is like living in the world, which is forbidden to ascetics like me. I really cannot remain here any longer; the time has come for me to leave."

The landowner urged him to stay, but nothing could overcome the hermit's determination.

"Well, then," said the landowner, "if you must go, good luck to you." Reluctantly, he escorted the ascetic to the outskirts of the village and returned home.

After walking a short way by himself, the ascetic thought it would be a good thing to cajole the landowner. Sticking a straw in his matted hair, he hurried back to the village.

"What brings you back again?" asked the surprised landowner.

"I just noticed that a straw from your roof got stuck in my hair. We hermits must not take anything which has not been given to us, so I have brought it back to you."

"Throw it down, sir, and go your way," said the landowner. "Imagine!" he said to himself. "This ascetic is so honest he won't even take a straw which does not belong to him. What a rare person!" Thus, greatly impressed by the ascetic's honesty, the landowner bid him farewell again.

At that time the Bodhisatta, reborn as a merchant, was travelling to the border on business and happened to stop at that same little village, where he witnessed the ascetic's return with the piece of straw. Suspicion grew in his mind that the hermit must have robbed the landowner of something. He asked the rich man whether he had deposited anything in the ascetic's care.

"Yes," the landowner answered rather hesitantly, "a hundred pieces of gold."

"Well, why don't you just go and see if it's still safe?" the merchant suggested.

The landowner went to the deserted hermitage, dug where he had left his money, and found it gone. Rushing back to the merchant, he cried, "It's not there!"

"The thief is certainly that long-haired rascal of an ascetic," said the merchant. "Let's catch him."

The two men ran after the rogue and quickly caught him. They kicked him and beat him until he showed them where he had hidden the gold. After they had gotten back the money, the merchant looked at the coins and scornfully asked the ascetic, "Why didn't this hundred pieces of gold trouble your conscience as much as that straw? Take care, you hypocrite, never to play such a trick again!"

When his life ended, the merchant passed away to fare according to his deserts.

When he had ended his lesson, the Buddha said, "Thus you see, monks, that this monk was as conniving in the past as he is today." Then he identified the Birth by saying, "This monk was the scheming ascetic of those days, and I was the wise and good merchant."

Additional notes for Jikijitsu during sesshin.

All periods are 25 minutes long exactly (unless the teacher specifies something different). If, due to this rule, the last period of a block is only 5 minutes long, it is 5 minutes long.

Jiki hits han before all but the early morning block. The diagram for this is with the han, but it is important to have practised it prior to sesshin.

4.00 a.m. Jiki rings wake-up bell. Don't get up more than a couple of minutes before this. Head server may ask Jiki to start the water for tea. Light candle on altar and incense. Light the lamps at Gorrick's Run.

4.l5 a.m. Jiki hits inkin once, stands with it, a second hit, bow and lead to morning exercise area (if this is somewhere other than dojo) If the group is large enough to be split in two, Jisha leads second group in exercise.

4.25 a.m. Hit inkin for fast kinhin, slow down after a couple of minutes. If out of dojo, hit inkin again as Jiki crosses threshhold. When all are at places, hit inkin again, bow and sit facing in for tea.

4.55 a.m. Following kentan, when Roshi bows on threshhold just as he is about to leave the dojo, Jiki bows and reaches for bell to end period. If Roshi has not entered dojo by 4.55, end period anyway.

6.30a.m. Head server strikes han with accelerando, Jiki answers with inkin
All stand up with bowls, Jiki hits inkin, all bow.

At the end of the meal, following last sutra, Ino hits clappers, Jiki hits inkin, Ino clappers, Jiki inkin, all rise with bowls at eye level, Jiki hits inkin, bowls put away, cushions straightened, Jiki dismisses on inkin.

l0.00 a.m. Jiki leads long kinhin, outside if Gorrick's Run.

l.55 p.m. Teisho: Jiki hits shijo once, says "Prepare for teisho" then goes out to hit han once as signal to teacher, and waits there.

2.00 p.m. Jiki hits drum 3 times (if by some mishap the Jisha is still in the dojo at this time, Jiki should delay drum until Jisha is ready outside dokusan door.)

4.30 p.m. Around this time the Shodoka reading begins. This depends on the time of kinhin. If a period began at 4.20 p.m., sit for 5 minutes. Jiki hits shijo once and says, "Prepare for reading" and hands round sutra books. Ino begins. Always sit for about 5 minutes after Shodoka reading. If kinhin ends between 4.25 and 4.35, then at the end of kinhin, Jiki says, "Sit facing in" and hands out sutra books. In this case, after reading, continue zazen for l0 minutes, then do kinhin. (Shdoka usually takes approx l5 minutes to read.) Be sure there's enough time for kinhin before meal bell

8.30 p.m. At the end of last kinhin, Jiki says, "Sit facing in". If dokusan is over, and Roshi is not in the dojo by 8.55 p.m., go ahead with evening ceremony.

DOKUSAN/SOSAN/INTERVIEWS

The following are notes for the Jisha about interview procedure & times.

Sosan (pronounced SHOSAN), happens Day l, 4 and 7 during sesshin. It is done strictly in dojo order, Jisha tapping each person on the shoulder, taking about 6 at a time. Jisha sits at head of line, and hits bell for everybody during sosan, whereas at other times, Jisha only hits bell for first person. To start sosan, or any block of interviews, teacher rings bell, Jisha replies with an accelerando, teacher rings again, then Jisha rings 2 open bells. Jisha indicates that first in line actually waits on verandah edge with shoes on to save time crossing to hojo.

Jisha has to establish with teacher what time he wants to finish, so that Jisha can estimate when to close the line. Maintain communication.

Closing the line: to signal all have completed interviews for time being, ring 3 open bells, then l mute, l open. Jisha then returns to dojo.

Ordinary dokusan/interviews happen other days at 5.l0 a.m., 3.00 p.m. and 7.00 p.m. These are done in blocks, or as upstairs and downstairs dojos, when sitting at Gorrick's Run. Before they begin, Jisha announces "Block l for dokusan/interviews" or whatever is appropriate. When a block is coming to an end, Jisha announces "Last call for block l", then "Block 2 for dokusan."

IF YOU NEED TO MAKE ANY ANNOUNCEMENTS

It is best to make these after meals, before the break.

NOTES ON SITTING UP ON LAST NIGHT - YASA

Teacher announces "sitting up late" on the last night, and then Jisha goes into details about what the guidelines are.

Prepare beds first, so as to minimally disturb others when you decide to finish your yasa. People not sitting up have priority.

Don't use any incense, bells or candles.

Last person remember to turn off light, close doors.

Additional explanatory notes for Jisha during sesshin.

Make sure Roshi has list of sesshin participants and seating plan in dojo.
Jisha should ensure hojo altar is set up, bell, incense/candles, ready.
May need lamp on hojo steps for early morning and evening dokusan.

4.55 a.m. After Kentan, when Roshi leaves the dojo, follow him out after he has bowed. Go into dokusan room, light candle and incense, check water. Check Roshi on when to start dokusan. Set up dokusan line.

SOSAN: Tanto goes first on Day l. Except for sosan, Jisha always goes first to dokusan.

6.l5 a.m. Stop the dokusan, noting down in order those returned to dojo unseen. Jisha goes in to Roshi after last person, then returns to dojo.

8.30-ll.30 a.m. Unless otherwise mentioned by Roshi, usually no dokusan in this block.

(Dokusan is pronounced with short 'o' as DOKSAN.)

l.55 p.m. Jisha sees Teisho area (chestnut tree) is organised with Roshi zabuton/zafu water, tape recorder standing by. Tanto waits with incense. Jisha picks up incense from Tanto and goes and waits outside Roshi's door.

2.00 p.m. When Jiki beats drum 3 times, Jisha knocks fast on Roshi's door 3 times, enters, bows, picks up teisho notes, bows, then leads Roshi to dojo. Bow at dojo door, follow Roshi in. Bow to altar. Place teisho notes on mat and come down right hand side of dojo, hand over incense, and return to seat near lectern.

approx 2.30 p.m. After teisho, follow Roshi out with notes. Bow, turning book so that arrow on cloth faces Roshi, give it to him and bow. Return to dojo.

3.05 p.m. approx. (Check Roshi for dokusan time) Enter dokusan room, light candle, incense, pick up people left over from morning in correct order. Then announce BLOCK1 FOR (or whatever) after morning people have left, then go to dokusan line. Roshi rings handbell. Jisha accelerando (l0 secs). Roshi rings bell. Jisha ring twice, then go yourself. (Remember for Sosan, Jisha rings bell for people) ends 4.45/4.50 p.m. TO FINISH OFF DOKUSAN:

3 open bells, l closed bell, l open bell
AFTER Roshi's bell. Put bell & cushions away and return to dojo.

6.55 p.m. Kinhin Jisha sets up line, lights incense, candle, lamp, checks Roshi's water and start time.

7.00 p.m. approx. after bells Jisha picks up any leftover people and then announces X BLOCK FOR DOKUSAN

8.50/9.00 p.m. approx. Nobody in to dokusan after 8.45 p.m.
(check with Roshi).
Close dokusan line (bells as above) return to dojo.

A Critique of Kapleau's "To Cherish All Life"

first look at them and then respond. First, Kapleau contends (p. 34), "...that even before th timethe scriptures of the various spiritual traditions in India condemned flesh eating as not c spiritual progress." Using Koshelya Walli's THE CONCEPTION OF AHIMSA IN INDIAN THO states (p. 37), "The teaching of ahimsa influenced the spiritual climate of the Buddha's day." this he quotes six passages of "ancient Hindu" texts from Walli's book.[1] The first reads Meat can never be obtained without injuring creatures, and injury to sentient beings detrimental to heavenly bliss; therefore one should shun meat eating... How then cou Buddha have allowed (defended?) meat eating, being so much against the current of spiritu time? Secondly, he states that the Mahayana sanction against meat eating flatlycontradic Theravada position. He mentions the Sanskrit Lankavatara-, Surangama-, Mahaparinirvana- Brahmajala-sutras. He quotes from the first (p. 33): It is not true that meat is proper food permissible when the animal was not killed by himself, when he did not order others it, when it was not specially meant for him...Again, there may be some people in the fut who...being under the influence of the taste for meat will string together in various ways arguments to defend meat eating... Of this Kapleau states (p. 34): ...as Conze a other scholars have pointed out, many of the Sanskrit scriptures were contemporary, or so, with the Pali [Theravada]. Isn't it reasonable to suppose that if the elders of the Mah satisfied that the Theravada suttas correctly reflected the Buddha's views as respec eating, they would have remained silent on this point? It is worth noting the above two arguments are used by Kapleau to show why (p.34) "the Mahayana teachings directly contra Theravada in the matter of meat eating." He also on the basis of these two arguments states "...commentators [who] attribute the difference [between the Mahayana and the Theravada] morality that took place in the years between the compiling of the two set of scriptures" are v Thirdly, Kapleau asks (p. 39-40), "How did those words imputed to the Buddha get into the answer is simple: Monks and scribes stillattached to meat eating put them there." There are underlining this statement. First, Kapleau states (p. 30): There has never been a genuin master either before, during, or after the Buddha's time who has defended meat ea denied that it is a bar to realization of the highest states of spirituality. Why? Because m stimulates the lower passions.... In other words, it is inconceivable that as a "genuine spiritual master' the Buddha could have "defended" meat eating. Secondly, he points out, re Davids' and Conze's work, that the Pali canon (as it is with the other canons) shows editing, prejudices or points of view" of the school it belongs to. The conclusion has to be that, using terminology of the Lankavatarasutra, that monk scribes "under the influence of the taste for edited into the Pali texts "sophistic arguments to defend meat eating." So stands Kapleau. first contention that early Indian scriptures prohibited the eating of meat can only in part be b textual evidence. Some did and some did the opposite. If Kapleau wants us to believe that m not commonplace before, during, and after the Buddha's time, the evidencemarshals strongl view. Walli states that Indians of theVedic and Upansishadic times were meat eaters, and s supported meateating.[2] In volume two of R. C. Majumdar's THE HISTORY AND CULTURE dealing with the time between 600 B.C. and 320 A.D., we findthis statement[3]: In spite

Buddha did not object to their [the monks] eating it if the animal was not especially kille

It is important to note that the texts Kapleau mentions are thetathagatagarbha texts, and it reasonable to argue that the movetoward vegetarianism arose both from internal as well as pressures. Kapleau, for his third argument, offers neither "evidential material" nor"reasone argument". What Kapleau offers us is the fact that the Pali canonshows evidence of editing, that the Buddha could not allowmeat eating; therefore, allowance of meat eating in the Pali t it is mere assertion. Of course, we cannotknow with certainty what the Buddha said, but we important pieces of tradition in Buddhism is the Jivakasutta in the Pali canon. For Kapleau (p Jivakasutta makes no sense inallowing meat that has not been seen, heard, or suspected o for oneself. He sees this as freely sanctioning "meat eating foreveryone" and by implication, "butchering and the horrors ofthe slaughter house." Contrary to Kapleau and others this is n ora defense of eating meat for everyone. The rules of this discourse and of thecorrespondin directed strictly to monks who unless illare not allowed to ask for food, accepting whatever is

And it has to be remembered furthermore that as an almsman the Bhikkhu was no dependent on the offering he received on his begging round, but that as a person to be faced with in understanding this issue is well put byConze: Since it is impossible to eat a food by going round a village from house to house, and if this village is inhabited by non-vegetarians [non- Buddhists<?>, who would have been common even well after th comes up against a serious difficulty.[11]) We must keep in mind that in discussing th rationale of the Jivakasutta,we are not talking about Southeast Asian and Japanese societie which are targets of Kapleau's vitriol. We are talking about a society thatwas not Buddhist, a of the forest dwelling mendicants, of whomthe Buddhists and the Jains were a part, obtained by goingamong the houses taking whatever food that was offered. There is no evidencethat mendicants were exclusively, or even predominately,non-meat eating. To the contrary, Nand states, "The JainaCanonical texts bear ample evidence to show that meat-eating or fish-eati

Jivakasutta is: But if they [monks] ate the more (by ordinary standards) delectable cows, pigs, chickens, and sheep, not only are they indulging themselves in the manner but, even worse, they are indirectly causing pain and death to other living creatures and perpetrating morally indefensible acts.(p. 33) We shall here let Ruegg speak once more:
Finally, since in Buddhist thought it is the intention with which an act is accomplished th determines its moral and karmic quality, the Bhikkhu's accepting and eating meat in the conditions specified above cannot be dismissed as necessarily a mere subterfuge allow the vinaya. None of the different schools rules mention the three allowances, but none of the rules of any school prohibit meat eating. The discussion of meat eating in the Pali texts can least three places in the Pali vinaya, and these three allowances are found in the vinaya text the Mahasanghikas. Again, it may be that the Mahasanghikas have the oldest pratimoksa, b necessarily to say that their vinaya texts as a whole are older. Nakamura in his INDIAN BUD comparative study of the vinayas is "a favorite subject of Japanese scholars." He is of the op upon recent and exhaustive Japanese studies, that the Pali vinaya is the oldest, followed by Dharmaguptas, and then we have the Mahasanghikas. In a footnote in John C. Holt's DIS Canonical Buddhism of theVinayapitaka, Holt states: "Hirakawa argues that the Suttavibhan Vinaya represents the oldest version of the first part of theVinayapitaka that has survived. H assertion on the fact that thePali recension contains the least amount of apadana material w other texts. Hirakawa considers apadanas to be a genre ofliterature from a later period. See STUDY OF THE VINAYA (Tokyo:Sakibo-Busshoron, 1960), pp.12-15." This now brings u The Ven. Minh Chau is in his THECHINESE MADHYAMA AGAMA AND THE PALI MAJJHI (Saigon: The Siagon Institute of Higher Buddhist Studies, 1964) of the opinion that this disco dropped from the Chinese text: "Again the dropping from all the Chinese Agamas of the Pali 55...."(p. 31.) It can probably be argued that the Chinese canon shows far more evidence of editing then does the Pali canon. The Agamas were brought in to China after Mahayana Bu been established there, and it is far more likely that biases of the translators are reflected in Chinese texts. For example, the Chinese version of the Anguttara Nikaya, the Ekottaragama hinayana and mahayana, which signifies a very late editing, indeed. The Pali Anguttara Nika fixed about 1st century B.C., but the Chinese version can be dated about the 2nd or 3rd cen according to Nakamura.

INTRODUCTION

In November 1992, David Craig, head of Religious Broadcasting for the World Service of the BBC, and Rev. Martin Forward, Interfaith Officer for the Methodist Church in Britain, visited Sri Lanka to gather material on Buddhism for a series of programmes to be broadcast in 1993 during a focus on South Asia. I helped to plan their programme and was also asked to prepare a few talks for the World Service's daily "Words of Faith" spot -- a four minute pre-recorded broadcast sent out three times each day. Four talks resulted, broadcast in April and May 1993. Towards the end of 1993, I was asked for more and six went out in April and May 1994. Of these ten talks, eight have been selected for the present Bodhi Leaf: four from the 1994 series (presented first) and the four from the 1993 series (slightly expanded, placed after the 1994 talks).

The themes of the talks are rooted in my journey, as a Christian, into Buddhism. In the mid-1980's I felt the need to "let go" of my own religious conditioning to enter the world of another faith. It grew from a conviction that people with an interest in religion should not remain imprisoned within one framework but should explore others. The choice of Buddhism and Sri Lanka was a natural one for me. Buddhism's emphasis on meditation and non-violence touched my own interests as a Christian, and a visit to Sri Lanka in 1984 had left me with the feeling that my link with the island was not finished.

I originally intended to be in Sri Lanka for one year. One year, however, became seven and a half, from 1986 until 1993. My aim throughout was not only to study Buddhism but to practise it. I did not consider myself involved in "interfaith dialogue" although I'm sure some perceived my actions in this way. I wanted to enter Buddhism on its own terms, as a human being rather than as a Christian. The subjects of all the talks printed here arise from the personal journey of discovery that resulted. They draw on conversations with Buddhist friends, travel to different parts of the country in times of war, the experience of meditation, and my reading of the Pali texts. Most importantly, they reflect the concerns which developed as the interests I brought from Britain encountered Buddhism and Sri Lanka: the relationship between non-attachment and outgoing compassionate action; the practical meaning of //anatta// (no soul) and its implications; the benefit of //sati// (mindfulness) for the individual and society; the resources Buddhism can offer to those working for social justice and inter-ethnic or inter-religious harmony; the question of a woman's role in society.

My journey into Buddhism was not always an easy one and of course I could not let go of my Christian conditioning completely, but it has brought me to a stage when I can say with utter sincerity that I revere the Buddha and take refuge in his teachings. I remain a Christian, one who seeks to follow the self-sacrificial path of Jesus of Nazareth, but I also feel at home in a Buddhist meditation centre. The talks, I hope, will show that this is possible. I dedicate them to all the Sri Lankan friends who have brought me to a deeper understanding of the heart of Buddhism.

1. Mindfulness

Once I told an academic in Sri Lanka that I practised a Buddhist form of meditation. Flippantly, he asked whether I was able to levitate. That's not an uncommon reaction. It confuses meditation with self-induced trance or making the mind a blank, something that is unrelated to everyday life. But to make such a confusion is a mistake. True Buddhist meditation is a vigorous form of mind-training which can transform both thought and action.

In the Theravada Buddhist tradition, found in Burma, Sri Lanka, and Thailand, the practice of mindfulness or "bare attention" is very important. When sitting in meditation, perhaps noting the breath as it touches the inside of the nostrils, thoughts inevitably enter the mind. Usually they relate to oneself in the past or the future. Recent conversations replay themselves. Decisions yet to be made thrust themselves forward. Reactions of dislike to bodily pains arise. And occasionally, images freed from a deeper level of our being move slowly upwards. When thoughts and feelings arise in meditation, they are to be simply observed. They are not to be repressed or pushed aside, but neither are they to be allowed complete freedom to proliferate. Their arising and passing is noted without censure or praise.

When I first began to meditate I discovered that thoughts and feelings are fluid, ever changing, often uncontrollable, frequently illogical and irrational. It was a painful realization, since I had assumed my mind was under my direct control. But it was also the beginning of self-knowledge, the beginning of knowing how my mind worked and the doorway to modifying conditioned and negative patterns of reaction in my own life.

At one meditation centre in Sri Lanka, high in the mountains, surrounded by tea estates, the first session begins at five in the morning. I had to get up by candlelight, pull on warm clothes, and cross the grass to the meditation hall, under a sky often brilliantly full of stars. One morning, I was gazing at the dark, silvered beauty of the sky when I heard steps below me. At that moment, I caught my mind saying, "Go on into the meditation hall so that they can see you were up first." Normally, I would have hurried into the hall to show my punctuality, but on that occasion I noted the thought, recognized the element of competition, and consciously refused to act on it. I stayed for several more moments wrapt in the pre-dawn stillness, feeling the cool air against my skin, and I was certainly not the first to settle my cushions before the silent, candle-lit image of the Buddha. And I know it was the practice of //sati//, of mindfulness, which made that moment of insight into my own competitive egotism possible, insight into a childish wish to impress, to be top of the class.

Meditation of this kind is hard work. It has nothing to do with making the mind a blank, though it can lead to peace and calm when the racing mind stills and there is only the present moment. One monk who taught me put it this way: "Meditation is the ultimate practice of non-violence. Suffering, pain, and feelings of anger are not suppressed but faced, confronted, and transformed."

2. Non-Retaliation

In one sermon of the Majjhima Nikaya, one of the five sections within the collection of sermons in the Pali Canon, the Buddha says to his disciples:

> Monks, as low-down thieves might carve you limb from limb with a double-handed saw, yet even then whoever sets his mind at enmity, he, for this reason, is not a doer of my teaching. This is how you must train yourselves: neither will my mind become perverted, nor will I utter an evil speech, but kindly and compassionate will I dwell, with a mind of friendliness and devoid of hatred.
